Biliousness is a condition characterized by a disturbance of the digestive organs. The stomach is debilitated, the liver torpid, the bowels constipated. There is a loathing of food, pains in the bowels, dizziness, coated tongue and vomiting, first of the undigested or partly digested food and then of bile. Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets allay the disturbances of the stomach and create a healthy appetite. They also tone up the liver to a healthy action and regulate the bowels. Try them and you are are certain to be much pleased with the result. For sale by all druggists.

"Thank goodness, housecleaning is almost over at our house," was the remark made a day or two ago by one of Oakland's matrons as she stopped an acquaintance on the street, "and," she added, "I am not the only one glad of it. My husband has been in a fret ever since work was commenced and had all manner of excuses for getting away from the house in order to avoid helping to lay carpets, hang curtains and move stoves, but after a little persuasion on my part he pitched in and in a short time the house underwent a complete change in appearance and what seemed a bugaboo to him was only a blessing in disguise. He is very happy over the tidy appearance of things and has promised to help again next year."

Mr. Frank W. Watts, of Baltimore, was here a few days last week.

T. P. Warnick, Esq., of Bloomington, visited Oakland on business Monday.

Big combination formed at Swanton to buy wool for cash. C. S. May, proprietor.

The postoffice at Blaine will not be moved acerossthe river to Kitzmillersville as was contemplated.

Miss Jessie Fringer, who spent the winter at Eglon with her aunt, Mrs. Louis Bush, has returned to Oakland.

Trailing arbutus, the daintiest and prettiest of our wild flowers, is in bloom.

Townshend & Son have a nice, neat line of plaids, percales, organdies, colored lawns, lace curtains, bedspreads, sheets, etc., away down.

Harper Bartlett, who has a position with a lumbering firm at Clarksburg, spent Sunday in Oakland with his parents.

John T. Sincell, Esq., was at Kingwood Monday on business connected with the sale of some coal lands in which he is interested.

Did you see that line of summer goods, laces, embroideries, silks and velvets at Townshend & Sons? Cheaper than ever. 8 4

Senator Ravenscroft and family, of Accident, were in Oakland Tuesday on their return home from a visit to the Senator's parents in Allegany county.

Messrs. Lloyd Lowndes, Jr., E. L. Mitchell, E. H. Sincell and Sheriff Oester are down in the lower end of the county this week making a survey of some lands in litigation.

The census enumerators in this county appointed in accordance with the act passed at the recent extra session of the Legislature, are making rapid headway with their work.

Painters, carpenters, paperhangers and all other artisans of Oakland are kept as busy as they can be building and beautifying property in Oakland.

A note was received at this office Tuesday from Hon. G. W. Moon, now in Washington, stating that his family had been removed from Washington to his old home in this county.

The cold storage warehouse now building on the lot adjoining the electric plant for the Cumberland Brewing Company is almost completed.

Senator Ravenscroft has let the contract to A. D. Naylor & Co. for the installation of a steam heating apparatus in his office building in Oakland, work to begin on the same shortly.

Mr. J. T. Bonnett, of this place, had the misfortune to fall from a ladder, at Bloomington, last Wednesday. He was badly bruised and will be laid up for some time, but not dangerously hurt.—Piedmont Independent.

Mr. Wm. Moody, of Bloomington, was in Oakland Tuesday attending a meeting of the board of directors of the First National Bank. Mr. Moody is just now recovering from a severe attack of inflammatory rheumatism with which he was confined to his bed for a number of weeks.

New call cards for the subscribers of the Garrett County Telephone Company have been printed at this office and distributed. The new cards contain the names and calls of all subscribers to the line and are quite an improvement over the arrangement of cards heretofore in use.

Mr. Graham Dukehart, of Baltimore, Right Eminent Grand Commander of Knights Templar of Maryland, will visit Oakland Lodge Ancient. Free and Accepted Masons on the night of the 24th inst. The visits of Mr. Dukehart to the brethren at stated intervals is always a source of pleasure and profit.

There are still a few idlers and bums to be seen on the streets notwithstanding the great demand for workers. When these specimens get into trouble and are in dire need it is an utter waste of charity to help them. They should take David Starr Jordan s advice—if they are not fit to stay on the earth they should get under it and thus could be at least useful enough to help nourish the cabbage.

The tramp question is not settled yet. While some towns get rid of the parasites by making them work it only causes them to move on and annoy some one else. The thriftless idler does not want to work and will not work unless under compulsion, while there is an abundance of it for all and the world is suffering because it is not done. If all towns would adopt the plan of putting the tramps to work it would keep them moving if it didn't make decent citizens of them.

Mr. Don Howard Parsons, of Keyser, W. Va., spent Sunday in Oakland.

Mrs. Kate Mauldin went to Washington on Friday to remain indefinitely.

Merchants Smith and Callis, of Hoyes, were in Oakland Saturday last.

M. N. Wilson, Esq., of Wilson, was in town a day or two this week on business.

Rev. John Moon, of Mountain Lake Park, was in the city last Saturday and made this office a brief visit.

Mrs. Jennie Johnson left Oakland Tuesday morning for Baltimore, where she will remain for a week or ten days on visit to relatives.

Michael Nathan, Esq., of Grantsville, was in Oakland Saturday attending a meeting of the stockholders of the Maryland Mining Company.

A Pennsylvania man paid $7 for an old safe which was considered worthless. He found in it $4,500, and he now considers it a pretty safe investment.

Henry Barnard, Esq., of near Bloomington, was here Tuesday when he purchased a tract of 100 acres of farming lands near his home place in District No. 4.

The West Virginia Educational Association will hold a convention at the Park July 2 and 3. Manager Rudisill will put the tabernacle in a very inviting shape for the occasion.

An exchange gets off these very appropriate lines: "The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year, when men in panic flee from home—housecleaning times are here."

The Mountain Lake Park Philosopher says that he once knew a man who was so afraid of wasting energy that he thrashed his boy and prepared kindling wood for the morning fires at the same time.

The summer schedule on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad will go into effect the latter part of this month. No changes of importance is anticipated in the running of the trains except that two additional accommodations will be put in service.

Attention is directed to the advertisement of the Queen City Novelty Co., general agents for the Quaker bath cabinet, appearing in this paper. We have no hesitancy in recommending this cabinet as the best made. It will do all that is claimed for it.

An editor printed an item which stated that "the man who was hugging the hired girl had better stop it or his name would be published." In a few days about 50 citizens paid up their subscriptions and told the editor to pay no attention to foolish stories going around.

A note received in Oakland from the family of Rev. B. Ison conveys the intelligence that the Doctor has suffered a relapse and that his death is momentarily expected. It was the intention of his family to bring him to Oakland within the next few weeks, his condition being so much improved.

Here is something worth a trial: It is said that rats have so great an antipathy to castor oil that, when it is smeared lightly about the places they frequent, or on the articles they attack, they will give both a wide berth and make themselves conspicuous by their absence so long as the objectionable oil is in evidence in and about their haunts.

Richard S. Browning, Esq., son of Hon. and Mrs. R. T. Browning, left Oakland Sunday morning for the State of Washington, where he will visit friends for a few weeks prior to making the trip to Nome, Alaska. At Seattle, Washington, he will be joined by Michael Nathan, M. M. Ashby, John Shartzer and possibly others from here who are interested in the Nome gold fields.

Dr. Charles Beachy, of Grantsville, was in Oakland last Friday on his way home from the South where he spent the winter. While in town he was the guest of his sister, Mrs. David Durst. During the winter Dr. Beachy visited New Orleans, La., Birmingham and other cities. He expects to go to Nome, Alaska, this summer and next winter on his return from the north remain in San Francisco, Cal.

In speaking of the census a leading paper remarks: "It is in the matter of age that a slight element of fiction appears now and then in the schedules, for a careful study of the reports reveals that there are more of the fair sex aged about twenty-five than can be accounted for. Women of twenty-five in 1891 must have been fifteen in 1881; but the women entered in the returns twenty-five exceed the young girls of fifteen, of whom they should be only the diminished survivors!"

There have been a number of forest fires in the county thus far this season, the majority of them arising from the carelessness of land owners who are preparing new ground for planting. To get rid of the stumps and brush they set fire to the heaps and in that way the fire often spreads to adjoining lands, consuming fencing, valuable timber and in some cases endangering the lives of stock and the buildings of their neighbors. The practice of setting fire out promiscuously should be stopped.

Austin Brown, Esq., is in Pittsburg this week taking lessons in embalming.

Ex-Mayor R. S. Jamison returned Monday morning from a trip to Baltimore.

Dr. S. M. Hardman, eye, ear, nose and throat specialist, Grafton, W. Va. Spectacles and artificial eyes fitted.

Supervisors of Elections C. E. Ellithorp, of Bittinger, was in town a day or two this week on business.

Attorney Gilmor S. Hamill returned yesterday afternoon from a business trip east.

The bountiful rain last night refreshed growing vegetation and settled the dust.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard Smouse, of Fairmont, spent Sunday in Oakland with friends.

Rev. George I. Uhler, the pastor, will preach in the Lutheran church here Sunday morning and evening.

Mrs. George A. Walls and Mrs. Dr. Showalter, of Kingwood, were here Monday evening on their way east.

Commander R. M. G. Brown, of Morgantown, was in Oakland last week for a few days on his return home from Washington.

If all the promising young men we hear about would keep their promises there would be little need of a poor house.

Homer Smouse has moved his jewlery store from the Central Hotel building to a room adjoining Truman West's property.

John Shartzer will leave on Saturday for Seattle, Washington, and after remaining there for a few days will go to Nome, Alaska.

Luther Riley, employed at the Crellin mill, was injured last Saturday by having two of his fingers badly lacerated in a machine at the mill.

A few strawberries have been on the market in Oakland for the past two or three days, with prices entirely too high for the excheuquer of the average mortal.

Messrs. Wm. C. and "Jack" Kidd, of Baltimore, are in Oakland this week. The latter is engaged in the lumber business in Baltimore, and is here in the interest of his business.

Cumberland citizens have raised a fund to purchase the site for the Carnegie Library, subject to the appropriation by vote of the people of the $2500 annual maintenance fund.

Garden making, the bane of man and the joy of women, is in full blast hereabouts. Give the woman a rake and a can of seeds, either garden or flower, and she is in her element. Give a man the same material and he thinks the fates are against him.

Marshall Lohr, son of County Treasurer William M. Lohr, is in town this week assisting his father with his office work. Just at this season of the year when the tax bills are to be made out and other routine work of the office transacted it keeps our obliging Treasurer busy.

Contractor Kennedy, who is now engaged in paving Second street from Alder to Liberty, finds it almost impossible to secure labor to assist in the work. Although the force now employed by Mr. Kennedy is small the work is being pushed forward rapidly. The curbing has all been set and fills are now being made for the reception of the brick. The contract will be finished in three weeks provided the weather remains favorable.

Someone who has studied the peculiar faculties required of the county school ma'am pays her the following eulogy: "She must be a primary, intermediate, grammar grade, high school teacher combined; she must be able to build fires, adjust fallen stovepipe, put in window panes, sweep, dust, split kindling, drive a horse, keep out of neighborhood quarrels, know how, when and where to whip a bad boy, understand the school laws, raise money for libraries, keep all kinds of records, plant trees on Arbor day, be of good moral character and pass an examination in all branches of modern education. For these accomplishments she receives thirty dollars per month perhaps. Think of a girl getting that salary; out of this she pays her board, buys her clothes, attends the summer school, buys educational papers and books, attends all county conventions and furnishes slate pencils for the pupils. What is left she adds to her bank account or starts a bank if she prefers."

Was a Deserter.

Charles Hatton, a young soldier boy, who was taken off a Baltimore and Ohio passenger train and placed in jail at Martinsburg, W. Va., recently for riding the "blind baggage," is a deserter from Battery F, Second Artillery, Washington Barracks. Baltimore and Ohio Detective Burnett, in compliance with instructions from Washington, took the prisoner to Washington and received the reward for his capture.

ASKING THEIR POLITICS.

Democratic Ring is Securing Poll of State Through Alleged Census.

The Hagerstown Herald says:

"It was learned here yesterday that some of the Democratic enumerators are going about the districts with poll books containing the names of the voters. The names in these books are marked according to the voter's politics. Wherever a man's politics is not known the poll taker asks. This, of course is intended to give the Democratic machine a complete poll of the State at the State's expense. Every citizen should be on his guard. These enumerators have no right to ask a man his politics and they should be promptly and flatly refused an answer to so impertinent a question.

"The State is burdened with the expense of taking a census that will necessarily be incorrect and behind it the ring is simply polling the State for political purposes at the expense of taxpayers."

Saved by Pet Rattlesnakes.

Friday night Levi Dorton, who lives in the mountains nine miles east of Morgantown, W. Va., swore out a warrant before Justice M. Hayes for the arrest of Edward Hart, a neighbor, whom he charges with firing grass and leaves, thereby burning his fences and endangering his home.

Dorton, who is a typical mountaineer, has a collection of rattlesnakes and says they swarmed about his door rattling fiercely and thus awoke him from a nap. When he opened the door they glided in and coiled around his legs, terrified by the fire. He pacified them and got them to uncoil and then put out the fire.

It is believed the fire was accidental, but as there was a similar occurrence last year Dorton is thoroughly aroused. He lives in a home his father built in 1780 and has one of the finest collections of Indian relics to be found. He is 75 years old but straight as an arrow and vigorous.

To Carry Children to School.

A plan to carry children to school in sparsely settled districts at public expense has been proposed to the Dorchester County School Board. It is claimed by the advocates of this plan that it would be less expensive than building and equipping schoolhouses in places where the attendance is small. It is thought a practical test will be made on the plan next year and, if successful, that it will be extended to all districts where it may be thought to be advantageous.

Home From Washington.

Mr. William McCulloh Brown, who for a year or more was connected with the Coast and Geodetic Survey at Washington, has left the service and returned to his home at Bayard. Since Mr. Brown no longer serves the government he is in a position to give his attention to engineering work for private individuals.

Garrett County Bank Statement.

Elsewhere in to-day's issue we publish the statement of the Garrett County Bank made in accordance with the law enacted a few years ago by the Legislature. The statement shows the bank to be in a healthy condition financially and the business of the institution conducted along safe and conservative lines.

New Soda Water Fountains.

Within the past few days Col. Sturgiss, proprietor of the Red Cross Pharmacy, and Mr. Joseph E. Harned, of the Oakland Pharmacy, have received new soda water fountains from the manufacturers. Both fountains are works of art and the cooling and refreshing soda which will be drawn from them during the heated term which is al most upon us will be highly appreciated by the thirsty.

Pan-American Postage Stamps.

The Pan-American postage stamps have been put on sale at a number of offices throughout the country. The designs are altogether different from any that have yet been issued. The one cent stamp has a steamship engraved upon its face; the two cent stamp has a long train of cars; the four cent stamp has an automobile. The five center has a suspension bridge and the eight cent stamp has a cut of the proposed Panama ship canal with vessels in the ways. The new stamps will be popular from the first. A large number of them have been issued by the Post Office Department and they will be used through the spring, summer and fall.

Money to Loan.

$4,000 to loan on first mortgage in in sums to suit upon town property or nearby farms.

Knights of the Golden Eagle.

On Monday night, April 29th, 1901, there was instituted a lodge of the Knights of the Golden Eagle at Mountain Lake Park by the following grand officers: Past Supreme Deputy at Large Jacob H. Aull, of Baltimore; Grand Chief Richard H. Johns, of Baltimore, and Grand Sir Herald G. S. Young, of Cumberland. The following officers were elected and installed:

Past Chief—C. E. Duckworth.
Noble Chief—C. F. Dawson.
Vice Chief—H. B. Ferguson.
High Priest—J. S. Harvey.
Venerable Hermit—Thos. Callis.
Master of Records—H. E. Flowers.
Clerk of Exchequer—F. P. Arnold.
Keeper of Exchequer—T. J. Harris.
Sir Herald—J. G. Hayden.
Worthy Bard—L. Callis.
Worthy Chamberlain—C. Fisher.
Esquire—Lee Hayden.
First Guardsman—C. E. Michaels.
Second Guardsman—L. Bittinger.

After hearing a short address from each of the grand officers and a few very appropriate remarks by Rev. J. S. Harvey and Rev. Charles Fisher and short talks by each of the members, who emphatically declared that the ritualistic work of the Golden Eagle was surpassed by none, and at the close Deputy Supreme Chief at Large and Past Supreme Chief Jacob H. Aull presented our past chief, C. E. Duckworth, with a beautiful badge who promptly replied with some touching remarks and said that he hoped he would wear it with credit and honor to Olive Branch, Castle No. 9. After saying good night and good bye, the lodge adjourned to meet on Monday night, May 6.

More Vegetable Seeds.

Monday evening this office received for distribution from Senator Wellington a great number of seeds consisting of peas, cucumber, watermelon, muskmelon and spinach. These seeds are put up by the Agricultural Department at Washington and are intended for the free use of agriculturalists. You may have them for the asking. Come before all are distributed.

Beware of a Cough.

A cough is not a disease but a symptom. Consumption and bronchitis, which are the most dangerous and fatal diseases, have for their first indication a persistent cough, and if properly treated as soon as this cough appears are easily cured. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy has proven wonderfully successful, and gained its wide reputation and extensive sale by its success in curing the diseases which cause coughing. If it is not beneficial it will not cost you a cent. For sale by all dealers.

She 81, He 35.

Grant Burgess, aged 33, was married on Monday to Miss Polly Moreland, aged 81, at Bismark, Grant county, W. Va., by Rev. J. H. Browning. Burgess is reported "well off." They have been good friends ever since he was born and have been together a great deal. It was a case of love, not at first sight, but at last sight so far as the bride is concerned.

Tragedy of Yet Wing

By Julia Truitt Bishop.

(Copyright, 1901, by Authors Syndicate.)

IT WAS a gray day, with rain about to fall. Miss Harvey fluttered in at the door of the Chinese Mission, clad in gray and pink, and with a bewitching childishness in her eyes, which she hoped might not lead to the undoing of Fung Yet Wing, who was waiting for her at his own especial deal table. Yet Wing had a smile of his own, and greeted her with it. What Yet Wing's smile meant Miss Harvey did not know, for she had been teaching him only two years; and to learn anything about the pupils of the Chinese Mission one must take time.

Yet Wing's books were in a neat little pile before him; his white cuffs were linked with gold buttons, his immaculate collar was brought together with a satin tie, which was adorned with the pretty wishbone pin she had given him for a Christmas present. Miss Harvey always looked him over complacently, until she came to the braid of long black hair which was coiled in a neat little coil at the top of his head, with a shaved area all around it. Miss Harvey always felt that her hold on Yet Wing lacked something of completeness while that coil of hair topped him off so conspicuously.

"Oh, you are always early, Yet Wing!" she cried, looking at him just a little. These Chinese were so peculiar, and she was in a flutter when she thought of the danger. It would never do to encourage anything like that—but now, were they to be blamed so dreadfully, if once in awhile—they—well, if they really learned to love some pretty girl who chanced to be their teacher? Neither was the girl to blame for being pretty.

Not that Miss Harvey would have this happen to her—oh, not for a thousand worlds. She would die of mortification, she said to herself as she puffed out the pink silk vest a little more and glanced at Yet Wing.

"Yeh—me come ea'l-ly," he said with the same smile. "Me lakkee lea'n."

In another minute Yet Wing was laboriously getting through the Bible lesson for the day, each word going off with a sharp explosion, not unlike a train of fireworks:

"An'—Jesiss—entled — an'—pass'—flou'—Jelicho.

"An'—bee-hol'—dewass—a — man—name'—Zacchou-us — whiss — wass—ole chief—amoung—de — pullicanss—an'—he—wass—lich."

The fireworks exploded all along, down to the end of the lesson.

"Now do you know what that means?" asked Miss Harvey.

"No—me not unnestan' Engliss," said Yet Wing with calm readiness.

Miss Harvey did not understand what it meant, either, so she put her head to one side and cried archly:

"Oh, Yet Wing, what shall I do with you if you don't try to understand? Well, here is your reader—come now, read this."

Yet Wing bent his celestial countenance over the book and set another train of explosions going:

"Once—dewass — a — man—who—had—a—"

"Now spell that next word," commanded Miss Harvey, in the cooing, kindergarten voice she had found so effective with him.

"P-l-e-t-t-y," spelled the pupil. "Plitty."

"And do you know what that means?" chirped the teacher.

"Yeh—like you," said Yet Wing, his smile widening into a grin.

"Like me! The idea!" cried Miss Harvey. It had come at last—just as she feared. This was the Chinese method of informing a girl that she was beloved. She had unwittingly ruined Yet Wing's peace of mind. How anxious she had been to avoid this, all the Sundays she had come here against her brother's wishes, to sit beside the little deal table and teach Yet Wing to read Bible lessons he did not understand.

But while Yet Wing's poor little foolish dream was destined to be crushed, why should she wound him unnecessarily? Why should she not be as kind to him as she could be under the circumstances?

She looked at him gently, yet with melancholy. Perhaps she would ask him next Sunday for her sake to cut off that braid of hair. It would make her glad, and yet sorrowful, too, to know that he would do it without a moment's hesitation. There was something so pathetic about this hopeless love—a Chinaman—for a lady of her station—and she must be so careful not to encourage him. Her brother would be so angry—and he had such a high temper, and was so disgustingly brutal when he began to talk about—about the things she did. But she would always say that it was not her fault, and it was not Yet Wing's. It was simply one of those things that could not be helped.

"It lainin'," said Yet Wing, whose oriental eyes were turned toward the window.

"It rains every Sunday," said Miss Harvey, gently. "I shall have to wait until my maid brings my umbrella and cloak."

"What he' name?" asked Yet Wing, with the guileless directness of his race. She smiled sadly. He was interested in everything that pertained to her.

"Her name is Annie," said Miss Harvey, softly. "Here is the hymn, now, Yet Wing—'At The Cross.' Now sing your best—for my sake."

In response to which timid plea Yet Wing was presently throwing great unction into:

"Ala-a-at an' did, my tlavileed,
An' did my slovel die?
Would he leiote lat sacled head
Fo' sluch a wollas I?
Atte closs, atte closs, wha'ee fluss saw lelite—"

Yet Wing frowned mightily while he sang, for this English was truly a devilish language, and was not to be sung without great enlargement of the mouth.

It was all gone through with, even to the jerky concert of "Ou' Fader—who aht—in—heben—" and Miss Harvey and her maid were carrying homeward through the rain. Miss Harvey justly felt that she must confide in some one or die.

"It has come about just as I feared, Annie," she said, tragically. "My pupil has—has lost his mind, I suppose—and is half crazy about—about Me! Did you ever hear of anything so absolutely preposterous? Think of it! A—a Chinese laundryman! Wouldn't my brother be furious?"

"Well, faith, an' it 'ud be a great savin' of laundry bills," said Annie, who was from up Belfast way, and could see a bright side to everything.

Miss Harvey's just indignation kept her scornfully silent until they had reached home and gone into the side door. While Annie shook out the wet umbrella and stood it in the rack, Miss Harvey glanced out of the window and suddenly screamed and sat down, clasping her hands.

"Look, Annie!" she cried; "look out of the window! Can that be—is that—Yet Wing?"

"It looks like the bilious heathen," said Annie, indignantly, after a hasty inspection of the figure that stood pensively under an awning on the opposite side of the street. "A pretty subject he is, to stand himself up in front of people's houses! Shall I go out an' shoo 'im away, Miss?"

"Oh, that would be too cruel!" moaned Miss Harvey, walking up and down and wringing her hands desperately. "Oh, what shall I do? Was there ever anything so unfortunate? He may begin to follow me about town—and perhaps sing under the windows—he has a very good voice—but think how it would look. Oh, how unfortunate I am, to have—perhaps if I had worn plainer clothes to the Mission—but now the harm is done, and I will never forgive myself, never!"

"Well," suggested Annie, with an eye at the crack of the curtain, "your brother'll be home pretty soon, an' it's my belief that he'll throw the brassy heathen over the courthouse. An' anyway, the neighbors are raisin' the windows, now."

Miss Harvey screamed.

"Oh, Annie," she cried, "go and call him over and tell him that he must not stand there, looking at the house that way. Tell him that it troubles me—Me—and then I know he'll go."

Annie's trim figure disappeared; and Yet Wing's teacher heard a sound of voices, which presently grew louder. She listened. Annie was saying with spirit:

"You just wait till I get Mike Finney a-holt o' you, you slantin'-eyed—"

And at this point Annie came back, her face crimson.

"Them that wants the Chinaman can have him," she cried, indignantly. "He's settin' there on the steps like he meant to wait for the crack o' doom, an' if your brother comes he'll think doom's cracked."

This horrible possibility decided Miss Harvey. She puffed out the pink vest, dabbed both eyes with a little lace handkerchief, and went droopingly to the door. Yet Wing still sat enthroned on the steps, placidly looking at the rain.

"Yet Wing," she murmured, weakly. Yet Wing arose and smiled.

"Sle comee back?" was his enigmatic question.

"Yet Wing, you must go away," whispered Miss Harvey. "You must not come to my house any more. I am very sorry for you—I hope we will be friends—I shall still teach you, Yet Wing—"

"You go alay!" retorted Yet Wing, whom the gods had made mad. "Me come mally pletty gu'l—An-nee—she tleach me. Me no likee you fo' tleachee—you too old. Me lait fo' Annee."

When Miss Harvey went back into the house where Annie was holding the fort behind the sofa armed with a broom, she walked very straight and her look was severe.

"Has he gone?" questioned Annie, tremblingly.

"He has gone," replied Miss Harvey, drily. "Annie, you need never come to the Mission after me again—never again. I find that you have a most unfortunate influence over those men. That poor, ignorant Yet Wing—there is no telling what harm has been done to him. He seems quite demented. Tell my brother he needn't wait dinner for me—I have a headache."

And Miss Harvey went to her own room, and locked the door, and sat down in the corner furthest from the mirror.

Wounded Vanity.

A woman cries ten times out of wounded vanity where she cries once out of really wounded feelings. And each one of the ten times does her good. Let your wounded vanity smart all that it will, for vanity is a kind of "proud flesh" of the human soul that has to be treated with sharp caustic every little while to keep it from becoming an excrescence that will disfigure the whole character.—Ladies' Home Journal.

THE FARMING WORLD

KEEPING CELLARS DRY.

An Excellent and Easily Applied Arrangement to Prevent All Danger from Flooding.

In draining the cellar of a dwelling house, barn or other farm building in low places, some means will often need to be made use of to prevent flooding. An excellent arrangement for this purpose, which is adapted to either tile drain or ordinary stone ditch, is shown in the sectional illustration. Make a wooden box (a) of about same dimensions as drain or tile, and two or three feet in length. Saw off one end so as to leave it somewhat beveled. Take a piece of not too stiff leather and cut square so as to be just a little smaller than outside of box on beveled end. Nail this on a square piece of board (c), just enough smaller than leather, to leave one inch of the leather projecting on all four sides. Tack one of the projecting edges to the top, or shortest bevel, side of box, making the completed valve and valve seat. Over the beveled end of the box having attached to it the valve, slip another box (b), large enough for the purpose, and about one foot long, to protect the working parts of the device.

Dig down at the point it is to be placed in drain, and removing enough tile, if they are used, for the purpose, fit the valve boxes tightly in place, the longest box toward cellar. All sudden high water backing up will close the valve and be prevented from entering the cellar. As soon as the outside water subsides, the valve will open and allow water in cellar to escape. If the valve is applied in box just right, it will work perfectly.

If it is desired to have trap arranged so that access may be had to the valve at any time for removal of rubbish, etc., make it as described in every respect, but with the larger horizontal box on outside of valve seat. Instead of a horizontal box, make a vertical box (c) extending up to the ground level. This may have a hinged lid (d), or be otherwise covered. The illustrations show how the trap will look when so arrranged.—J. G. Allshouse, in Farm and Home.

DEPENDS ON THE MAN.

Nothing Enables a Dairy Farmer to Create a Private Butter Market But Attention to Details.

The farmer who wishes to make butter at home must pick up a route and retail his own butter, as he will find that the stores don't want it and won't handle it. They can get creamery butter that is reasonably uniform, and will give them less trouble than trying to handle butter made by Tom, Dick and Harry. Even the careful private dairyman is at a disadvantage unless he has regular private customers. To-day one farmer told us: "I am using a separator and take great care to have everything neat and clean, and do make first-class butter, but I can't sell it at any of the stores. The creamery near us only averages 16 cents per pound for butter fat, and we can't make anything at that price, but their butter always sells and ours won't. We dropped out because we got discouraged trying to give them clean good cream, while there were lots of patrons who took no care of their milk and were very dirty." This man acted discouraged and wanted to sell some of his cows. His only hope is to work up a private trade. One man from a neighboring town recently brought in a lot of his own butter, and canvassed the stores, but couldn't sell a pound, or hardly get an offer. He was discouraged, but he has a reputation for not being neat. A near neighbor of the latter brings in weekly what 30 good cows make, and has a steady trade at 25 cents in summer and 30 cents in winter. He also sells chickens, eggs, apples and beef. He makes good butter, is neat, and I believe is prospering. It all depends on the man.—Rural New Yorker.

World Will Never Starve.

The department of agriculture at Washington, after careful investigation, announces that the world is in no danger of starving to death for centuries to come, even if the present line of food products should become wholly exhausted. It has been discovered that the nut trees of the world alone could feed a population three times as great as the present number of inhabitants. Besides the nut products, there are a hundred vegetables, palatable and nutritious, which are practically unknown to the civilized chef. A single tribe of western Indians has a menu of 41 kinds of fruits and vegetables of which the Caucasian housekeeper has never dreamed in her domestic philosophy.

The dairy farmer should own the best land, milk the best cows, hire the best hands and make the best profit

CRATES FOR THE FARM.

Indispensable Where Orchard and Garden Work Is Carried On in a Strictly Up-to-Date Manner.

Every farmer should have a few bushel crates. The illustration shows one of the crates ready for use. It is a slat crate throughout. The corner pieces are American elm 2¼-inch corner sawed, thus one piece after it is sawed will make two pieces to nail slats on. The slats are Norway pine lath, one lath cutting into three lengths without waste. The two pieces the bottom slats are nailed to are not lath, but elm fence pickets one-half inch thick. These hold nails better than Norway pine and are stronger than common lath. The corner posts are 14 inches long, the end slats 12 inches and the side slats 17 inches long, making the outside dimensions of the crate 14¼ inches deep, 12 inches wide and 17½ inches long. If you let the side slats project over the ends of the end slats the outside measurement will be 12½ by 17 inches, instead of 12 by 17½ inches. One might think that one-half inch would not make any difference, but it does, in just this way: A crate 12 by 17½ inches works to advantage in a wagon box, while 12½ by 17 inches works to a disadvantage. Three or four neighbors can decide on the number of crates they want, and then give their order to some local planing mill and get the material cut ready for nailing at a fraction of what it would cost for each one to place his order. It is better than employing a carpenter, as the pieces must be exactly the same length—a difficult thing to accomplish when the cutting is done by hand.

The wagon illustrated is loaded with boxes of potatoes ready for market. You will notice that I have not only crates for potatoes, but a rack for the crates. This rack holds just 52 crates. They are placed two deep and three side by side, except the end tier of crates, which are placed with the long dimension parallel with the long dimension of the wagon. Each layer will then hold 26 bushels of potatoes by weight without rounding them up some. these two extra crates fill up the lower layer of boxes after the top layer has been unloaded, thus making our load weigh out 50 bushels.—Elias F. Brown, in Orange Judd Farmer.

FRUIT TREE BORERS.

Valuable Suggestions Condensed from a Bulletin of the Oklahoma Experiment Station.

Many orchards suffered a heavy and unnecessary loss during the last summer from the attacks of borers. Most farmers do not notice that there is anything wrong with the trees until the leaves turn yellow and begin to fall in midsummer. After this stage has been reached there is little hope for the tree, and it dies before frost. A glance at the tree will be sufficient to see that the bark on the trunk is dead and black in irregular spots and lines. Just beneath the dead bark is the borer's burrow filled with worm dust. If a large spot of bark is killed, the bark and wood begin to rot, and are soon filled with a mushroom growth which develops the fruiting portion on the outside of the trunk and resembles that which is seen on rotten logs. The rot may hasten the death of the tree, but a tree that is sound and free from blemish is very seldom if ever attacked by this rot The best thing to do is to keep the tree free from borers and other injuries The land should be kept free from grass and weeds and well cultivated Good, clean cultivation is worth more than all the washes and dressings that can be applied to prevent borers. A good wash, however, is often worth many times what it costs to apply and will do much toward preventing the attacks of borers and other insects A one-pound can of concentrated lye dissolved in two or three gallons of water makes a very good tree wash Another good wash can be made of one-half pint pine tar, one-half pint carbolic acid, and two gallons soft soap. These washes can easily be applied with an old whitewash brush or a swab made of old rags tied on the end of a stick. The wash should be applied two or three times to the trunk and large limbs during the spring and early summer.

Swill Barrel Is Doomed.

The modern hog is well kept only when it is kept in a clean place and given sweet, wholesome feed, such as will not carry with it the germs of death and decay. The swill barrel is one of the relics of a day that is fast closing to give place to a better one.

Winter dairying affords a good opportunity to market all kinds of grain and roughness to a good advantage by feeding to the cows.

New England Women

Have an Abiding Faith in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

After years of struggle to attain and merit public confidence, with a firm and steadfast belief that some day others would recognize in us the truth, good faith, and honesty of purpose which we know we possess, what a genuine satisfaction it is to succeed, and to realize the uplifting influence of the merited confidence of a vast army of our fellow beings.

Thus stands the Pinkham name in New England, and all over America, and nowhere is the faith in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound greater than in New England, its home. Merit, and merit alone, can gain this.

ORGANIC INFLAMMATION.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I was troubled very badly with inflammation of the bladder, was sick in bed with it. I had two doctors, but they did me no good. A friend gave me Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it helped me. I have now taken three bottles of it, and I am entirely cured. It is a God-send to any woman, and I would recommend it to any one suffering as I was. I think, if most of the women would take more of your medicine instead of going to the doctors, they would be better off. The Compound has also cured my husband of kidney trouble."

MRS. MABEL GOOKIN,
Box 160. Mechanic Falls, Maine.

NERVOUS PROSTRATION.

"For two years I suffered from nervous prostration, the result of female weakness. I had leucorrhoea very badly, and at time of menstruation would be obliged to go to bed. Also suffered with headaches, pain across back, and in lower part of abdomen. I was so discouraged. I had read of Lydia E. Pinkham's Compound, and concluded to give it a trial. I wrote to Mrs. Pinkham, and received a very nice letter in return. I began at once the use of her Vegetable Compound and Blood Purifier, and am now feeling splendid. I have no more pain at monthly periods, can do my own work, and have gained ten pounds. I would not be without your Vegetable Compound. It is a splendid medicine. I am very thankful for what it has done for me."—MRS. J. W. J., 76 Carolina Ave., Jamaica Plain, Mass.

PAINFUL PERIODS.

"I cannot help but feel that it is my duty to do something in regard to recommending your wonderful medicine. I must say it is the grandest medicine on earth, and have advised a great many suffering with female troubles to take it. I tell people I wish I could go on the platform and lecture on it.

"My trouble was painful menstruation. The suffering I endured pen cannot describe. I was treated by one of our most prominent physicians here for five months, and found myself getting worse instead of better. At the end of the fifth month he told me he had done all he could for me, and that I had better go to the hospital.

"My sister advised me to try your Vegetable Compound, as it cured her of backache. I did so, and took it faithfully, and am now cured of my trouble, and in perfect health, many thanks to your medicine. I cannot praise it enough, and would recommend it to all who suffer from any female weakness."—MRS. H. S. BALL, 461 Orchard St., New Haven, Conn.

TALENTED HELEN HAY.

Elder Daughter of Our Secretary of State Will Soon Publish a New Volume of Verse.

Literary critics of Washington say that "John Hay's daughter" will become one of the successful poets of America. It is about three years ago that Miss Helen Hay published her first efforts in verses, and, independent of the fact that the writer was a daughter of the secretary of state, the book commanded immediate attention. Miss Hay called that initial effort "Some Verses," and she has since revised it for three editions. Last autumn she published a dainty little collection of child rhymes, "The Little Boy Book," and this also was favorably received.

For the last year Miss Hay has been diligently working on the most ambitious work she has yet attempted, and in a few weeks this will be given to the public. It is entitled: "The Rose of Dawn," and is a love story of the south seas told in blank verse. Throughout the book there are snatches of lyric poetry, love songs and ballads of the people, and in these Miss Hay's peculiar talent is vividly displayed. That eminent writer of the south seas and well-known literary critic, Charles Warren Stoddard, is enthusiastic over "The Rose of Dawn," and predicts a brilliant future for Miss Hay as a writer of lyric verse.

This talented young woman is one of the popular belles of the capital. She is feted and admired from the beginning to the end of the season, and few social events may be called successful when not graced by her presence, yet she finds time to write some of the most exquisite verse ever published. She takes a few hours in the morning, and just before dressing for dinner is a favorite time for her muse. She jots down then the thoughts that come during the hours of gayety, and later they are woven in dainty numbers. Miss Hay's verse, like that of most young writers, is inclined to sadness—the poetry of tears. In love songs and sonnets she is particularly adept. She naively says that she does not write from experience, since she has never felt the darts of the little rosy god, but that her impressions of the master passion are gathered from her friends. Some of her critics assert that when love strikes her harp she will sing her best songs and develop the germs of genius so apparent.

She is nearly 24, and possessed of physical charms as potent as the intellectual. In manner she is strikingly like the author of "Little Breeches," and her expression reminds one strongly of the secretary of state. Col. Hay is intensely fond of his elder daughter and delighted with her literary success. He has encouraged her to write since she was able to hold a pen, and, like Rudyard Kipling and Charles Warren Stoddard, he has an abiding faith in her future.

MOST USELESS EFFORT.

Why the Scolding Habit Should Be Compelled to Perish from the Face of the Earth.

Of all forms of human effort and execution scolding is the most useless. When a parrot, a chipmunk, a squirrel or bluejay scolds he is ludicrous. For people to scold is ludicrous, too, but with a difference, and assuredly the difference is on the unfavorable side.

It never did and never will do anyone any good. It has done much harm. Besides, scolding grows to be a habit. We have all suffered because of the shortcomings of some one else, receiving tremendous tirades over what we had no hand in, because we happened to be present when the scolding habit was yielded to by one of its victims.

Scolding is easy. It takes neither power of brain nor heart to scold. It does not even make any great draft upon the physical being. Any fishwife alive can be a grand success at scolding! Why compete with her?

Scolding should be compelled to perish from the earth. The tongue, the voice, the eye, the face—all should be trained not to scold; yes, and the pen, for of all things a scolding pen is the worst. And the habit once formed with the pen is apt never to be entirely shaken off.—Ada C. Sweet, in Woman's Home Companion.

AT THE SPINNING WHEEL.

A Fair Deacendant of John and Priscilla Alden Weaves Flax Into Old-Time Cloth.

A lineal desendant of John and Priscilla Alden, noted in revolutionary history, is living at Boston, and greatly cherishes the memory of her ancestors, whom Longfellow immortalized in his celebrated poem. She is one of the few women of New England who still use the spinning wheel, and she is said to be as expert as was her great-grandmother, Priscilla, after whom she is named.

At the exhibition of the Daughters of the Revolution at the Hotel Stratford in Boston the other day Miss Alden was the cynosure of all eyes. She sat at her timeworn spinning wheel, arrayed in old-fashioned Puritan gown and cap, and spun the tough flax and fine silken thread just as her long line of grandmothers had done for the past 200 years. She bears a striking resemblance to the first Priscilla and her sweet maidenly dignity and gentleness of carriage would have won the heart of John Alden himself could he have peered into the parlors of the Stratford yesterday and seen her at work at the wheel.

Many generations of Aldens have used the old wheel. Some of them spun flax upon it to make garments for those who defended the infant colony against the bloodthirsty Indians, and later on the thread of the uniforms of the continental soldiers of the revolutionary war was reeled off it. The wheel is a precious heirloom and hundreds of people visited the exhibition yesterday especially to see Miss Alden spinning it.

While sitting at her wheel Miss Alden occupied a chair that is also historic. It was originally the property of Gov. Bradford, of Plymouth Rock fame. It has remained in the Bradford family ever since, and many distinguished people have used it during the last two centuries.

PHILOSOPHY OF DRESS.

Why a Woman's Size Appears to Vary According to the Color of Her Gowns.

That the color of a woman's dress can make her look larger or smaller is a fact that many professional dressmakers now take into consideration.

Dressed in black and dark hues, stout women look smaller both in the street and when out walking; and by a use of the same hues, the dimensions of small people are so decreased that they appear like dwarfs.

The optical effect of white and light colors is to enlarge all objects, and make the stout woman who wears them almost mountainous in her appearance. She need not, however, look dingy and dull, for the rich, dark hues offered to her for selection are varied and numberless. Greens and blues, in their various shades, are better than reds, giving an effect of repose and distance.

All light-colored materials should be avoided for the waist. During the awkward age of girls, between the age of 12 and 14, dark blue or plain red cashmere or serge is found to be productive of the best results.

In choosing colors for dresses, the complexion must, of course, be taken into account. Those with sallow, dark faces should select clear tints, and scrupulously avoid glaring bright and decided hues. Those who possess clear skins and pale faces may wear all shades of rose, primrose, buff, light green, lilac, brown and violet.

Florid persons should wear the tints that subdue color and give the effect of distance, such as blue and green. The most lucky of all girls are those with fair complexions and a color. To them, few shades will be unbecoming. Those with pale complexions should wear only fresh colors such as cherry and pink.

Color in dress not only exerts an influence over the beauty of the wearer, but also over her health. Dark colors are found to absorb and give out smells of all kinds to a far greater extent than the light, and it is for this reason that professional nurses are not allowed to wear black dresses. It is said that for nurses black cotton is bad, black wool worse and black silk the most injurious of all. Some doctors refrain from wearing black clothes when visiting patients for the same reason.

The warmth and comfort of the body are also affected by the color of the clothes which cover it, white and light-colored fabrics reflecting the heat and black and dark ones absorbing it. Black, however, throws heat off sooner, and white clothing retains the natural heat of the body longer than black.—N. Y. Journal.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases of of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

BISHOP HANDY SAYS

"I Cheerfully Recommend Peruna to All Who Want a Good Tonic and a Safe Cure For Catarrh."

Prominent members of the clergy are giving Peruna their unqualified endorsement. These men find Peruna especially adapted to preserve them from catarrh of the vocal organs which has always been the bane of public speakers, and general catarrhal debility incident to the sedentary life of the clergyman. Among the recent utterances of noted clergymen on the curative virtues of Peruna is the following one from Bishop James A. Handy, D. D., of Baltimore:

"I take great pleasure in acknowledging the curative effects of Peruna. At the solicitation of a friend I used your remedy and cheerfully recommend your Peruna to all who want a good tonic and a safe cure for catarrh."— James A. Handy.

OTHER NOTABLE CURES.

A Husband Escaped the Pangs of Catarrh of the Lungs.

Most Cases of Incipient Consumption are Catarrh.

Edward Stevens.

Mrs. Edward Stevens, of Carthage, N. Y., writes as follows:

"I now take pleasure in notifying you that my husband has entirely recovered from catarrh. He is a well man to-day, thanks to you and Peruna. He took six bottles of your medicine as directed, and it proved to be just the thing for him. His appetite is good and every thing he eats seems to agree with him. His cough has left him and he is gaining in flesh, and seems to be well every way. I hope others will try your medicine and receive the benefits that we have."—Mrs. Edward Stevens.

When the catarrh reaches the throat it is called tonsilitis, or laryngitis. Catarrh of the bronchial tubes is called bronchitis; catarrh of the lungs, consumption. Any internal remedy that will cure catarrh in one location will cure it in any other location. This is why Peruna has become so justly famous in the cure of catarrhal diseases. It cures catarrh wherever located. Its cures remain. Peruna does not palliate; it cures.

Mrs. Frederick Williams, President of the South Side Ladies' Aid Society of Chicago, Ill., writes the following words of praise for Peruna from 973 Cuyler avenue, Chicago, Ill.:

Mrs. Fred. Williams.

"My home is never without Peruna, for I have found during the past six years that there is no remedy that will at once alleviate suffering and actually cure, as Peruna does. Four bottles completely cured me of catarrh of the head of several years' standing, and if my husband feels badly, or either of us catch cold, we at once take Peruna, and in a day or two it has thrown the sickness out of the system."—Mrs. Frederick Williams.

Mrs. W. A. Allison, of 759 Sheffield avenue, Chicago, Ill., is the Assistant Matron of the People's Hospital. She has the following to say about Peruna:

Mrs. W. A. Allison.

"I have had frequent opportunities to observe the wonderful curative effects of Peruna especially on persons suffering with a congested condition of the head, lungs, and stomach, generally called catarrh. It alleviates pain and soreness, increases the appetite and so tones up the entire system that the patient quickly regains strength and health."—Mrs. W. A. Allison.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

Liver Don't Act?

You know very well how you feel when your liver don't act. Bile collects in the blood, bowels become constipated and your whole system is poisoned. A lazy liver is an invitation for a thousand pains and aches to come and dwell with you. Your life becomes one long measure of irritability and despondency and bad feeling. CASCARETS act directly, and in a peculiarly happy manner on the liver and bowels, cleansing, purifying, revitalizing every portion of the liver, driving all the bile from the blood, as is soon shown by increased appetite for food, power to digest it, and strength to throw off the waste. Beware of imitations!

Pan-American Exposition Stamps.

A special series of postage stamps in honor of the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo, were distributed by the Post Office Department of the Government to all postoffices in the United States on May 1st.

The stamps are of uniform dimensions, 0.76 x 1.06 of an inch, and represent different forms of modern transportation methods. The borders take the colors of the regular series of the same denominations of stamps now in use. The words "Commemorative Series, 1901," and "United States of America," appear in the upper border above the vignette; the legend in the line below it designates some feature of transportation appearing in the illustration. The line at the bottom indicates the value of the stamp by Roman capital letters and Arabic numerals.

All of the central illustrations are from photographs as the objects represented appear to-day, and are printed in black.

The one-cent stamp represents steamboat travel designated by a side-wheel Lake steamer with one funnel, of the style generally used on the Great Lakes of to-day.

The two-cent stamp represents railway travel by a train of four cars and engine of modern pattern.

On the four cent stamp is a picture of the automobile of the closed coach order with two men on the box and a portion of the United States Capitol in the background. For this illustration a photograph of one of the Baltimore & Ohio automobiles, taken in front of the Congressional Library at Washington, with the Capitol in the background, was selected. The Baltimore & Ohio was the first railroad to inaugurate this method of transportation in connection with its train service.

The five-cent stamp has a representation of the largest single span steel bridge in the world bearing, two trolley cars, with a view of Niagara Falls beyond.

The eight-cent stamp shows the great ship-canal locks at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., and the ten-cent stamp shows an American Line steamship with two smoke-stacks and masts.

The series make a most interesting collection and is one which collectors will secure before the stamps are canceled in order to retain the effects of the minute engravings.

A Very Remarkable Remedy.

"It is with a good deal of pleasure and satisfaction that I recommend Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy," says Druggist A. W. Sawtelle, of Hartford, Conn. "A lady customer, seeing the remedy exposed for sale on my show case, said to me: 'I really believe that medicine saved my life the past summer while at the shore,' and she became so enthusiastic over its merits that I at once made up my mind to recommend it in the future. Recently a gentleman came into my store so overcome with colic pains that he sank at once to the floor. I gave him a dose of this remedy which helped him. I repeated the dose and in fifteen minutes he left my store smilingly informing me that he felt as well as ever." Sold by all dealers.

NOTICE TO Tax Payers!

This is to notify the tax payers of Garrett county that the annual levy for 1901 has been made and published, and to call their attention to the following abstract, Section 45, Chapter 508, Acts of 1890, relating to the discount to be allowed and the interest to be charged on all tax bills:

"All county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of the levy thereof, and on all county taxes paid on or before the first day of September a discount of 3 per cent. shall be allowed, and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. The Treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the tax bills for county purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt given for taxes so paid. But the discount shall not be allowed unless the whole amount of State and county taxes are paid when same is made.

SEVEN DEVELOPED GOLD MINES.

60 ACRES OF GOLD ORE

THE ARENA

Gold Mining and Milling Company

CRIPPLE CREEK, COLORADO.

This Property is Estimated to be now Worth More than $10,000 per Acre and will be Worth over One Hundred Thousand Dollars per Acre, with Proper Development.

CAPITAL STOCK, $1,000,000,

Divided into Shares of $1.00 Each, Full Paid and Non-Assessable.

The Arena Company offers 50,000 Shares at 50 cents each in a Property that is Worth over $600,000

For the purpose of raising money to purchase the necessary machinery to make the mines produce daily fully THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS IN GOLD, thus enriching every individual shareholder according to the shares he holds.

YOU CAN BUY ANY NUMBER OF SHARES YOU WISH,

and make more money than can be made in any other line of investment. The gold ore is in these seven developed mines. There are 3,000 feet of ore in a vein, and these veins are true mother veins, held within walls of granite, placed there by nature. The Company has already developed this property to demonstrate that it is one of the largest gold properties of the Cripple Creek District which is the greatest gold-producing camp on earth, its output last year aggregating $24,000,000, or nearly double the amount produced in the whole State of California.

At 50 cents per Share the Company is giving you a discount of 10 cents per share to start with, making 20 cents on the dollar. As already stated, this is done for the purpose of raising $25,000 to purchase improved machinery, air-compressor drills and electric plant. We have two large hoisting engines on this property, a commodious shaft-house, office buildings, boarding house for the men, stables, a powder-house, a large quantity of tools, etc. The reports on these mines, made by one of the best mining engineers in the State, succinctly describe these improvements.

NAMES OF MINES.

AZTEC, 210 feet in depth, with shaft-house, boiler and engine for hoisting, well timbered all the way down.
BONDHOLDER, 260 feet deep, hoisting engine and boiler, large iron shaft-house.
MEXICO AND MANHATTAN, both over 100 feet deep, on same vein as the Aztec mine.
CRYSTAL, JASPER AND GREAT EASTERN, on the same vein as the Bondholder, and opened in depth of 100 feet, and developments already made show over 4,000 feet of ore.

If you want to make money out of nature, become a producer of gold out of her treasure-vaults. The Arena group of mines will do it for you.

We can furnish the best of references—bank and mining engineers—and our title in the property is perfect, coming as it does through a patent from the Government. With more improved machinery, from $3,000 to $5,000 per day will be a conservative estimate of the output of these mines.

Remember that only 50,000 shares of this stock are for sale at 50 cents on the dollar. Orders for the number of shares desired, accompanied by Draft, Money Orders, Express or Cash in Registered Letters, can be sent to

The Arena Gold Mining and Milling Company,

VOLUME 25. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, MAY 16, 1901. NUMBER 10.

ON THE VERGE OF ETERNITY.

The Life of the First Lady of the Land Hangs Trembling in the Balance.

BELOVED WOMAN IS DYING.

The World's Sympathy Tendered to the President in This Hour of Dread Uncertainty and Sadness—His Sorrow is the Nation's Sorrow.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 16, 1.30 a. m.—At this hour Mrs. McKinley is reported to be dying.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 15, midnight.—The condition of Mrs. McKinley is most alarming. For several days she has taken nothing but liquid nourishment. Her extreme weakness excites the greatest apprehension, and a collapse is imminent.

It is learned that Mrs. McKinley's condition is considered serious by the physicians attending her.

Drs. Rixey and Hirschfelder were in consultation this morning and another physician will be called in this afternoon.

It is probable that if she recovers Mrs. McKinley will be unable to leave San Francisco by next Monday, when the stay of the presidential party was to have terminated.

The President will remain here with Mrs. McKinley.

At 10 o'clock this morning Secretary Cortelyou informed the Associted Press that Mrs. McKinley's serious illness had compelled the President to abandon his proposed visit to other states, to which he had looked with so much pleasure. As soon as Mrs. McKinley's health permits he will return to Washington by the most direct route.

Secretary Cortelyou also issued the following bulletin regarding Mrs. McKinley's condition:

There has been but but little change in Mrs. McKinley's condition since last night. She has gained in several respects and lost in others.

The President will remain quietly at Mr. Scott's residence today and will not take part in any of the exercises to be given in his honor.

Secretary of the Navy Long may leave the presidential party and depart for the east at any moment. He has received word that his daughter, who has been living in Colorado Springs for over a year for her health is dangerously ill.

Secretary Long is accompanied on the trip by Mrs. Long and a son of tender years. The boy was also taken ill yesterday at the Palace hotel where the Longs are staying, and the physician called in ordered the child's retirement to the bed at once. The secretary is worried over the illness in his family, and he is not inclined to continue his trip.

CORKSCREW PHILOSOPHY.

The devil and the anti-imperialists use subtle arguments.

The philosophy of nothingness is knowledge in the abstract.

Love of money is the homage many christians pay to the devil.

HAS OBTAINED CONTROL.

The Pennsylvania Will Now Direct the Destiny of the B. & O.

According to an article which appeared yesterday in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, the Pennsylvania has gained absolute possession or control of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. This, it is said, was accomplished by the purchase of the stock of the Maryland corporation, the requisite amount of the securities having been obtained about six weeks ago. The recent retirement of J. J. Hill and Charles H. Tweed from the management of the Baltimore and Ohio and the fact that their successors were Samuel Rea, fourth vice president of the Pennsylvania railroad, and James McCrea, of Pittsburg, vice president of the Pennsylvania company, which includes the lines west of Pittsburg, was regarded as evidence that the Pennsylvania people had already acquired a prominent place in the Baltimore and Ohio.

It is said that the actual fact of control was not made puplic at the time it was secured for the reason that some difficulty was met in getting possession of Baltimore and Ohio securities by reason of the exorbitant prices demanded for them. It is said that the policy to be followed by the Pennsylvania railroad in conducting the affairs of the Baltimore and Ohio has not yet been definitely determined, but that after several conferences it was decided by President Cassatt's councellors to leave the whole matter to him for settlement.

It is said that the two railroads will work in harmony so far as freight rates are concerned, and the taking over of the Baltimore and Ohio by the Pennsylvania is regarded in railroad circles as removing a disturbing factor that has long been a thorn in the side of the other trunk lines. While the Pennsylvania railroad has but four members of the board of directors at present, other members are favorable to the new interest. Just what further changes will be made in the board has not been determined, excepting that it is believed Mr. Solomon will retire shortly. He has long desired to be relieved, so that he could go abroad and spend some time in travel.

The relations between the Baltimore and Ohio and the Reading have been very close, and the Baltimore company owes its through line to New York to Reading and its new "first cousin," as an official terms the Central New Jersey. The present traffic agreements are to be maintained, so it is understood.

It is also declared to be the intention to permanently maintain both roads as separate companies. The retirement of Mr. John K. Cowen from the presidency of the Baltimore and Ohio is expected, but owing to the cordial relations existing between him and Mr. Cassatt it is not believed undue haste will be taken in this connection.

Libraries for Rural Districts.

Millions of dollars have been given in the past year to provide libraries for some of the largest and richest cities of our country. The country districts are far more destitute of literature, and generally quite unable to purchase it. The American Sunday School Union conducts its publication work, not for money making, but for the widest usefulness, and proposes that appeals be made to enable the Society to distribute its literature in larger amount and at lower rates to the needy. Foremost among the needs are:

1. Circulating Libraries for Rural Townships.—Appeals come for a thousand libraries, which could be wisely placed in a thousand rural communities in the Southern states. These would cost from $10 to $50 each. As many more such libraries could be wisely used in rural communities in the Southwestern and Western states and on the Pacific coast.

2. Religious Reading for Prisons.—There are over a million of "dependent and delinquent persons" in the United States. The Union has done much for them, and with the requisite funds can do much more.

3. Helps for the Study of the Bible for the Abult Immigrants.—Swedes, Norwegians, Danes and other foreigners coming to our country, and the new Spanish populations in Porto Rico, Cuba and the Philippines, call for special religious publications.

4. Bibles and Religious Reading for Homes.—The Union's missionaries could supply a hundred thousand non-church going families with a Testament or Bible, or with some book filled with the marrow of the gospel.

The funds, of which only the income can be used for distributing publications, are: Bucknell Fund, $5000; Cope Fund, $1000; Liberia Fund, $546; Book Fund, $13,019, Brace Fund, $14,917.

One-sixth of the income of the John C. Green Income Fund is also required to be used in procuring new works of a high order of merit, and some of the income of the Cresson Fund is also available. The income of the funds is utterly inadquate to meet even a small fraction of the needs. At least $20,000 a year is required to meet the ordinary calls, and $50,000 for supplying circulating libraries in rural districts.

One thousand dollars has been added to the funds for publishing and distributing the Society's publications while this report was in preparation.

Besides graded lesson helps, improvement has been made in the Young People's Paper, in the increased number of original stories and articles, which are illustrated by original drawings.

New editions of fifty-six works and nine new books have been issued.

While 1874 new Sunday schools were organized the past year, 594 were reorganized and 9123 visited and aided. The missionaries numbered 222, of whom 113 were at work during the whole year. The hopeful conversions reported numbered 7882, and the churches organized from the Union's schools numbered 105, of different denominations. The amount received for missionary work was $146,101.

Unfailing Sign of Prosperity.

There is one sure barometer of financial conditions in Kansas. Whenever the people feel rich they get up schemes to bore in the ground after oil or gas or other valuable productions. This propensity has given Kansas some very valuable coal, gas, oil and salt fields, and it is to be encouraged, not deplored. Today something like 50 towns are boring holes in the ground. At one place out in Western Kansas they are down close to 2,000 feet, and still are cheerfully chugging away. At Abilene $3,000 has just been raised by popular subscription for the purpose of boring and the work is to be started at once. In Hutchinson a new salt well is going down at the rate of 200 feet a day, and it is to have around it the biggest salt plant in the State. In Southern Kansas derricks are as thick as haystacks and they are finding things too.—Kansas City Journal.

M'COMAS PREDICTS VICTORY IN FALL.

Advises Putting Up a Good Ticket So As to Win Independent Support--Counties Are Very Much Encouraged Over Result.

Senator McComas is confident that the Republicans can win again this fall if they put up strong candidates. Referring to the election in Baltimore he said:

"It was a sweeping victory on a light vote. The framers of the excellent charter believed a spring election in Baltimore might be freed from politics. After years of trial it may be so. This year it could not be. The extra session of the Legislature was a daring political scheme. It made this spring election political and politically very important. It passed a law to disfranchise 11,000 illiterate voters, white and colored. Passed a local law for sewers by a political deal. It gerrymandered councilmanic and legislative districts to destroy the power of the independents in the Legislature and in the city council.

"The extra session schemers knew that the independent voters of Baltimore are as numerous as independents in Boston, and were confident that their schemes had defeated the Republican party and destroyed the power and influence of the Reform League, of other civic government reformers and of all the independent Democrats.

"This series of political outrages aroused all the active Republicans in the city. It made fair minded men dissatisfied. The mass of the people love fair play. The spectacle of the unwilling Legislature, herded like cattle, guarded like prisoners, the open dictatorial control of Senator Gorman at Annapolis, followed by Rasin's sweeping victory in the Baltimore primaries, disgusted citizens of Baltimore.

"The Republicans named a good ticket. Under the leadership of Chairman Mason their primaries were the fairest any party has held in Baltimore for a generation.

"The party as a result was united, harmonious, aggressive. The Democrats were divided. The Republican illiterates were eager to learn to vote the ballot. The white Republicans were resentful and grew more earnest as election day grew near. The white Democratic illiterates were evidently turned against their party. When the vote is analyzed this will more clearly appear, and I am sure it will be found that a larger percentage of colored illiterates voted than now appears. Before the fall election they will all try to do their duty.

"This victory in the city is a bugle blast which will arouse the Republican party in every county in the State. The harmony of our party in the city will be equaled by the harmony of our party in every county. The fight for the Legislature to defeat Senator Gorman and crush out Rasin, to restore our model election law, will make the legislative ticket the centre of the fight. On all hands I hear the Republicans say we must nominate tickets quickly to educate and arouce our illiterate vote. Our legislative ticket must and will be the strongest. In Baltimore, especially, our best men must be persuaded to run. Indeed, it were better for the Republican party and for the State that we should be defeated unless we can elect a far better Legislature than the present, whose regular session was so severely condemned by the Baltimore Sun, whose extra session has just been so emphatically rebuked by the voters of Baltimore.

"The Republicans in both branches of the city council in Baltimore are good men. They can serve their party best if they serve Baltimore best. If they be harmonious, cautious, conservative, they will vindicate their election. The fight in the autumn will thus be half won. The Republican campaign of organization will be extended to the counties. I am hopeful that the primaries in the city and State may be unusually good. In Baltimore the independents will help us if we give them a good ticket to vote for. That city will be the centre of the fight. The campaign will grow animated and earnest. An aroused public sentiment will once more fight Senator Gorman and Mr. Rasin. Their domination was never so uncontested in the Democratic party than it has been this spring. The voters of Baltimore and Maryland must meet and overcome the same men and issues they met and overcame in 1895. Let the city council be prudent; let the nominations be ur. sually good and we will repeat the verdict of 1895.

"Read the sentences in these letters I show you. Each letter is from a prominent Democrat. I withhold the names, though I believe were the writers present they would wish you to see them. This first letter is from one of the foremost and ablest merchants of Baltimore. I do not know a more broad-minded man in the South. Observe this sentence: 'While I have always been a good Democrat I was delighted at the result in Baltimore city yesterday.' Then read this extract from the second letter, the writer of which is a Democrat and a man of great force and strong mind. He has had wide experiedce in every industrial field. He never held political office, but his power influenced political actions in the Democratic party within the city and State. He says: 'I believe and sincerely hope yesterday's municipal election will have a favorable influence on the fall contest in both city and State. If the Republican party avoid factional disputes and name as good, clean men as they can command—not saints—I feel very confident the fall election will settle Gorman and Gormanism for good.' Several other wise business men who are Democrats but not Bryanites have expressed the same sentiment to me.

"The Baltimore majority ought to be doubled. The State ought to go Republican by an emphatic majority. Upon the Republican party is a great responsibility. They realize it. They will meet it worthily and we will carry the State this fall."

MARYLAND'S EXHIBIT.

Geological Survey Makes Showing of the State's Resources at Buffalo.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 14.—The Maryland commissioners recently decided that the Maryland geological survey could make the best showing of the resources of the State, and Dr. W. Bullock Clark, State Geologist, was authorized to prepare the exhibit shown in the mines building.

An allegorical picture representing the genius of geology uncovering the mineral wealth of Maryland occupies the upper part of the east front of the building. Below this are hung large maps of the State colored in various ways to represent geology, rainfall and temperatures, physiographic provinces, relative elevations and drainage areas. In the large windows are exhibited large colored transparencies of Maryland scenery and stone quarries and a series of photo-micrographs of sections of rocks colored as seen under the microscopes by polarized light magnified sixty diameters.

Nineteen frames of illustrations from publications, topographic and geological maps, scenes of quarries and coal mines cover the remainder of the wall space. One of the most striking objects is a pillar of coal, three feet high, weighing about three tons. This cost the Consolidation Coal Company an immense amount of care and labor to cut from the breast of the "Big Vein," which is fourteen feet thick, send it to the surface and ship it to Buffalo in one perfect piece. Seven smaller cubes represent some others of Maryland's famous coal seams.

The exhibits on the tables are mostly of economic value. At one end are shown the building stones from the principal Maryland quarries, blocks of various shapes represent the polished hammered and rock surfaces of Port Deposit, Guifford and Waltersville, Woodstock, Ellicott City and James Falls granites. Marble from the Beaver Dam quarries and the famous Seneca red sandstone and Shenandoah limestone are shown. This is backed by the exhibits of the Maryland slate companies—rough blocks and dressed slabs, modern neatly trimmed roofing slates and slates which have served on roofs for over a hundred years. The ornamental stones are represented by a collection of polished slabs of variegated marble. Potomac conglomerate and a beautiful series of serpentines including the precious variety and picrolite.

Next comes a less ornamental but very practical exhibit of the highway division of the survey showing various tests by specimen and photographs of machinery, to which stone, brick and cement are subjected at the laboratory in the Johns Hopkins University. The soils are well shown in a series of glass jars and tubes. Seven tubes are arranged around each soil specimen, each tube containing its proper proportion of the constituents of the soil.

Clays—labeled with their localities and properties—building and moulding sands, kaolins, ground flints and marls are shown in glass. Under the table on a series of steps and lighted by electricity are the clay products, enameled brick, fire brick, ornamental and common brick, sewer pipe, stove lining, crockery, tiles and terra cotta, some glazed, some unglazed, of all shades from bright red to white. These make a very attractive display and will represent the great richness and variety of Maryland's clays.

Installed in four plate glass cases is a very complete, systematic geological collection. The oldest known rocks are represented by contorted, faulted and metamorphosed rock specimens with ores of copper, iron, lead and gold. Each age is represented by its characteristic fossils—from the Cambrian trilobites to the elephant's tooth of the Pleistocene with such minerals and ores as occur, placed in their proper horizons.

A complete set of the publications of the geological survey, consisting of reports and atlas sheets, completes the display indoors. Outside the buildings are the larger pieces of terra cotta and slate.

Sulphur in Shoes.

An eminent physician writing about sulphur in regard to putting it in the shoes as a preventative of malaria, says it has been proved that mosquitoes carrying germs, are proved to have the power of inoculating human beings with malaria and other diseases, but neither mosquitos nor fleas, it is said, will touch the blood of persons who take sulphur into their systems. By putting a little sulphur into the shoes every now and then, enough it is said will be absorbed into the system to keep the pests off.

POSTSCRIPT.

BALTIMORE, MD., May 16.—A special from San Francisco received at 9.30 this morning states that Mrs. McKinley, wife of the President, is still living but her death is expected at any moment.

CIVIL WAR INCIDENT

Of Special Interest to the Citizens of Garrett County.

The Capture of Generals Crook and Kelley at Cumberland During the Civil War is Recalled.

The following letter was written by Mr. Henry P. Goddard, of Baltimore, to the Springfield (Mass.) Republican:

"In a recent issue you quoted a letter sent to the Chicago Record-Herald by a man at Leavenworth, Kansas, which alluded to the well-known story of the capture of Gens. George R. Crook and Kelley during the latter part of the Civil War by a company of Confederate soldiers, who dashed into Cumberland, Md., one night and took these officers from their beds at a hotel. The writer is quoted as saying: "It was a deed of daring bravery, well planned and ably executed. But when Gen. Robt. E. Lee heard of it he ordered the prisoners sent back to our lines, saying that he did not approve of this style of warfare. He did not consider it honorable."

"Ever since I read this statement in the Republican I have been trying to get at the facts in the case, as I was and am convinced that this statement as to the action of General Lee was untrue. I had frequently heard the story of the capture and knew that it was planned by a young Confederate soldier named Dailey, to whose sister General Crook was very devoted (and later married) and to whom I am told by her living sister, Mrs. Matthew Markland, of Oakland, Md., General Crook becomes engaged the evening before his capture, she then residing at Cumberlahd. I have always understood that young Dailey, who was somewhat of a daredevil, thought it would be a brilliant exploit for himself and a good joke on his sister to carry off her lover into the Confederate lines. The exploit was a brilliant one, and executed with daring and success, although the small number of Confederates (under command of Captain Dailey) were aided by intense darkness and a severe rainstorm prevailing at the time. I have always understood that General Crook was exchanged very soon after his capture, but until I saw the statement in the Republican never heard that General Lee disapproved the capture and can see no earthly reason why he should have done so, although I have recently found one or two old soldiers who have a vague recollection of having heard some such story.

"After reading the Republican I wrote to Mrs. Markland, who replies under date of April 14 that as she did not wish to trust to her memory in regard to the matter, having no date by her, she wrote to Judge Thayer Melvin, of the U. S. Court at Wheeling, W. Va., who was captured and taken to Libby prison with Gens. Crook and Kelley, being at the time a member of General Kelley's staff. She adds that Gen. Crook at once upon his return from Richmond rejoined her sister at Cumberland, which was and had been within the Federal lines at the time of his capture. She encloses me the reply of Judge Melvin to her request for information upon the subject. Under date of April 12 he writes her:

"'I regret that I am not able to give definite information concerning the exchange of Gens. Crook and Kelley. The records I never saw, and they are probably unavailable; and while doubtless I have had talks with both, the knowledge thus obtained has very largely faded with the years.

"'These officers, with myself and others held in Libby, were paroled for exchange in March, 1865, they being directed to report to Gen. Grant, at City Point; this, as was understood at his instance, he desiring to confer with Gen. Crook, perhaps; somehow or other I was included, being on the staff of one of these officers. We remained there for a night and part of a day and were given leaves of absence pending exchange. Certainly Gen. Kelley and myself were so given leaves, but I am not so certain as to General Crook. It is possible that he was exchanged at once, but my recollection is otherwise. But my distinct impression is that Gen. Grant

Just what further changes will be made in the board has not been determined, excepting that it is believed Mr. Solomon will retire shortly. He has long desired to be relieved, so that he could go abroad and spend some time in travel.

The relations between the Baltimore and Ohio and the Reading have been very close, and the Baltimore company owes its through line to New York to Reading and its new "first cousin," as an official terms the Central New Jersey. The present traffic agreements are to be maintained, so it is understood.

It is also declared to be the intention to permanently maintain both roads as separate companies. The retirement of Mr. John K. Cowen from the presidency of the Baltimore and Ohio is expected, but owing to the cordial relations existing between him and Mr. Cassatt it is not believed undue haste will be taken in this connection.

Libraries for Rural Districts.

Millions of dollars have been given in the past year to provide libraries for some of the largest and richest cities of our country. The country districts are far more destitute of literature, and generally quite unable to purchase it. The American Sunday School Union conducts its publication work, not for money making, but for the widest usefulness, and proposes that appeals be made to enable the Society to distribute its literature in larger amount and at lower rates to the needy. Foremost among the needs are:

1. Circulating Libraries for Rural Townships.—Appeals come for a thousand libraries, which could be wisely placed in a thousand rural communities in the Southern states. These would cost from $10 to $50 each. As many more such libraries could be wisely used in rural communities in the Southwestern and Western states and on the Pacific coast.

2. Religious Reading for Prisons.—There are over a million of "dependent and delinquent persons" in the United States. The Union has done much for them, and with the requisite funds can do much more.

3. Helps for the Study of the Bible for the Abult Immigrants.—Swedes, Norwegians, Danes and other foreigners coming to our country, and the new Spanish populations in Porto Rico, Cuba and the Philippines, call for special religious publications.

4. Bibles and Religious Reading for Homes.—The Union's missionaries could supply a hundred thousand non-church going families with a Testament or Bible, or with some book filled with the marrow of the gospel.

The funds, of which only the income can be used for distributing publications, are: Bucknell Fund, $5000; Cope Fund, $1000; Liberia Fund, $546; Book Fund, $13,019, Brace Fund, $14,917.

One-sixth of the income of the John C. Green Income Fund is also required to be used in procuring new works of a high order of merit, and some of the income of the Cresson Fund is also available. The income of the funds is utterly inadquate to meet even a small fraction of the needs. At least $20,000 a year is required to meet the ordinary calls, and $50,000 for supplying circulating libraries in rural districts.

One thousand dollars has been added to the funds for publishing and distributing the Society's publications while this report was in preparation.

Besides graded lesson helps, improvement has been made in the Young People's Paper, in the increased number of original stories and articles, which are illustrated by original drawings.

New editions of fifty-six works and nine new books have been issued.

While 1874 new Sunday schools were organized the past year, 594 were reorganized and 9123 visited and aided. The missionaries numbered 222, of whom 113 were at work during the whole year. The hopeful conversions reported numbered 7882, and the churches organized from the Union's schools numbered 105, of different denominations. The amount received for missionary work was $146,101.

Unfailing Sign of Prosperity.

There is one sure barometer of financial conditions in Kansas. Whenever the people feel rich they get up schemes to bore in the ground after oil or gas or other valuable productions. This propensity has given Kansas some very valuable coal, gas, oil and salt fields, and it is to be encouraged, not deplored. Today something like 50 towns are boring holes in the ground. At one place out in Western Kansas they are down close to 2,000 feet, and still are cheerfully chugging away. At Abilene $3,000 has just been raised by popular subscription for the purpose of boring and the work is to be started at once. In Hutchinson a new salt well is going down at the rate of 200 feet a day, and it is to have around it the biggest salt plant in the State. In Southern Kansas derricks are as thick as haystacks and they are finding things too.—Kansas City Journal.

M'COMAS PREDICTS VICTORY IN FALL.

Advises Putting Up a Good Ticket So As to Win Independent Support--Counties Are Very Much Encouraged Over Result.

Senator McComas is confident that the Republicans can win again this fall if they put up strong candidates. Referring to the election in Baltimore he said:

"It was a sweeping victory on a light vote. The framers of the excellent charter believed a spring election in Baltimore might be freed from politics. After years of trial it may be so. This year it could not be. The extra session of the Legislature was a daring political scheme. It made this spring election political and politically very important. It passed a law to disfranchise 11,000 illiterate voters, white and colored. Passed a local law for sewers by a political deal. It gerrymandered councilmanic and legislative districts to destroy the power of the independents in the Legislature and in the city council.

"The extra session schemers knew that the independent voters of Baltimore are as numerous as independents in Boston, and were confident that their schemes had defeated the Republican party and destroyed the power and influence of the Reform League, of other civic government reformers and of all the independent Democrats.

"This series of political outrages aroused all the active Republicans in the city. It made fair minded men dissatisfied. The mass of the people love fair play. The spectacle of the unwilling Legislature, herded like cattle, guarded like prisoners, the open dictatorial control of Senator Gorman at Annapolis, followed by Rasin's sweeping victory in the Baltimore primaries, disgusted citizens of Baltimore.

"The Republicans named a good ticket. Under the leadership of Chairman Mason their primaries were the fairest any party has held in Baltimore for a generation.

"The party as a result was united, harmonious, aggressive. The Democrats were divided. The Republican illiterates were eager to learn to vote the ballot. The white Republicans were resentful and grew more earnest as election day grew near. The white Democratic illiterates were evidently turned against their party. When the vote is analyzed this will more clearly appear, and I am sure it will be found that a larger percentage of colored illiterates voted than now appears. Before the fall election they will all try to do their duty.

"This victory in the city is a bugle blast which will arouse the Republican party in every county in the State. The harmony of our party in the city will be equaled by the harmony of our party in every county. The fight for the Legislature to defeat Senator Gorman and crush out Rasin, to restore our model election law, will make the legislative ticket the centre of the fight. On all hands I hear the Republicans say we must nominate tickets quickly to educate and arouce our illiterate vote. Our legislative ticket must and will be the strongest. In Baltimore, especially, our best men must be persuaded to run. Indeed, it were better for the Republican party and for the State that we should be defeated unless we can elect a far better Legislature than the present, whose regular session was so severely condemned by the Baltimore Sun, whose extra session has just been so emphatically rebuked by the voters of Baltimore.

"The Republicans in both branches of the city council in Baltimore are good men. They can serve their party best if they serve Baltimore best. If they be harmonious, cautious, conservative, they will vindicate their election. The fight in the autumn will thus be half won. The Republican campaign of organization will be extended to the counties. I am hopeful that the primaries in the city and State may be unusually good. In Baltimore the independents will help us if we give them a good ticket to vote for. That city will be the centre of the fight. The campaign will grow animated and earnest. An aroused public sentiment will once more fight Senator Gorman and Mr. Rasin. Their domination was never so uncontested in the Democratic party than it has been this spring. The voters of Baltimore and Maryland must meet and overcome the same men and issues they met and overcame in 1895. Let the city council be prudent; let the nominations be ur. sually good and we will repeat the verdict of 1895.

"Read the sentences in these letters I show you. Each letter is from a prominent Democrat. I withhold the names, though I believe were the writers present they would wish you to see them. This first letter is from one of the foremost and ablest merchants of Baltimore. I do not know a more broad-minded man in the South. Observe this sentence: 'While I have always been a good Democrat I was delighted at the result in Baltimore city yesterday.' Then read this extract from the second letter, the writer of which is a Democrat and a man of great force and strong mind. He has had wide experiedce in every industrial field. He never held political office, but his power influenced political actions in the Democratic party within the city and State. He says: 'I believe and sincerely hope yesterday's municipal election will have a favorable influence on the fall contest in both city and State. If the Republican party avoid factional disputes and name as good, clean men as they can command—not saints—I feel very confident the fall election will settle Gorman and Gormanism for good.' Several other wise business men who are Democrats but not Bryanites have expressed the same sentiment to me.

"The Baltimore majority ought to be doubled. The State ought to go Republican by an emphatic majority. Upon the Republican party is a great responsibility. They realize it. They will meet it worthily and we will carry the State this fall."

MARYLAND'S EXHIBIT.

Geological Survey Makes Showing of the State's Resources at Buffalo.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 14.—The Maryland commissioners recently decided that the Maryland geological survey could make the best showing of the resources of the State, and Dr. W. Bullock Clark, State Geologist, was authorized to prepare the exhibit shown in the mines building.

An allegorical picture representing the genius of geology uncovering the mineral wealth of Maryland occupies the upper part of the east front of the building. Below this are hung large maps of the State colored in various ways to represent geology, rainfall and temperatures, physiographic provinces, relative elevations and drainage areas. In the large windows are exhibited large colored transparencies of Maryland scenery and stone quarries and a series of photo-micrographs of sections of rocks colored as seen under the microscopes by polarized light magnified sixty diameters.

Nineteen frames of illustrations from publications, topographic and geological maps, scenes of quarries and coal mines cover the remainder of the wall space. One of the most striking objects is a pillar of coal, three feet high, weighing about three tons. This cost the Consolidation Coal Company an immense amount of care and labor to cut from the breast of the "Big Vein," which is fourteen feet thick, send it to the surface and ship it to Buffalo in one perfect piece. Seven smaller cubes represent some others of Maryland's famous coal seams.

The exhibits on the tables are mostly of economic value. At one end are shown the building stones from the principal Maryland quarries, blocks of various shapes represent the polished hammered and rock surfaces of Port Deposit, Guifford and Waltersville, Woodstock, Ellicott City and James Falls granites. Marble from the Beaver Dam quarries and the famous Seneca red sandstone and Shenandoah limestone are shown. This is backed by the exhibits of the Maryland slate companies—rough blocks and dressed slabs, modern neatly trimmed roofing slates and slates which have served on roofs for over a hundred years. The ornamental stones are represented by a collection of polished slabs of variegated marble. Potomac conglomerate and a beautiful series of serpentines including the precious variety and picrolite.

Next comes a less ornamental but very practical exhibit of the highway division of the survey showing various tests by specimen and photographs of machinery, to which stone, brick and cement are subjected at the laboratory in the Johns Hopkins University. The soils are well shown in a series of glass jars and tubes. Seven tubes are arranged around each soil specimen, each tube containing its proper proportion of the constituents of the soil.

Clays—labeled with their localities and properties—building and moulding sands, kaolins, ground flints and marls are shown in glass. Under the table on a series of steps and lighted by electricity are the clay products, enameled brick, fire brick, ornamental and common brick, sewer pipe, stove lining, crockery, tiles and terra cotta, some glazed, some unglazed, of all shades from bright red to white. These make a very attractive display and will represent the great richness and variety of Maryland's clays.

Installed in four plate glass cases is a very complete, systematic geological collection. The oldest known rocks are represented by contorted, faulted and metamorphosed rock specimens with ores of copper, iron, lead and gold. Each age is represented by its characteristic fossils—from the Cambrian trilobites to the elephant's tooth of the Pleistocene with such minerals and ores as occur, placed in their proper horizons.

A complete set of the publications of the geological survey, consisting of reports and atlas sheets, completes the display indoors. Outside the buildings are the larger pieces of terra cotta and slate.

Sulphur in Shoes.

An eminent physician writing about sulphur in regard to putting it in the shoes as a preventative of malaria, says it has been proved that mosquitoes carrying germs, are proved to have the power of inoculating human beings with malaria and other diseases, but neither mosquitos nor fleas, it is said, will touch the blood of persons who take sulphur into their systems. By putting a little sulphur into the shoes every now and then, enough it is said will be absorbed into the system to keep the pests off.

CIVIL WAR INCIDENT

Of Special Interest to the Citizens of Garrett County.

The Capture of Generals Crook and Kelley at Cumberland During the Civil War is Recalled.

The following letter was written by Mr. Henry P. Goddard, of Baltimore, to the Springfield (Mass.) Republican:

"In a recent issue you quoted a letter sent to the Chicago Record-Herald by a man at Leavenworth, Kansas, which alluded to the well-known story of the capture of Gens. George R. Crook and Kelley during the latter part of the Civil War by a company of Confederate soldiers, who dashed into Cumberland, Md., one night and took these officers from their beds at a hotel. The writer is quoted as saying: "It was a deed of daring bravery, well planned and ably executed. But when Gen. Robt. E. Lee heard of it he ordered the prisoners sent back to our lines, saying that he did not approve of this style of warfare. He did not consider it honorable."

"Ever since I read this statement in the Republican I have been trying to get at the facts in the case, as I was and am convinced that this statement as to the action of General Lee was untrue. I had frequently heard the story of the capture and knew that it was planned by a young Confederate soldier named Dailey, to whose sister General Crook was very devoted (and later married) and to whom I am told by her living sister, Mrs. Matthew Markland, of Oakland, Md., General Crook becomes engaged the evening before his capture, she then residing at Cumberlahd. I have always understood that young Dailey, who was somewhat of a daredevil, thought it would be a brilliant exploit for himself and a good joke on his sister to carry off her lover into the Confederate lines. The exploit was a brilliant one, and executed with daring and success, although the small number of Confederates (under command of Captain Dailey) were aided by intense darkness and a severe rainstorm prevailing at the time. I have always understood that General Crook was exchanged very soon after his capture, but until I saw the statement in the Republican never heard that General Lee disapproved the capture and can see no earthly reason why he should have done so, although I have recently found one or two old soldiers who have a vague recollection of having heard some such story.

"After reading the Republican I wrote to Mrs. Markland, who replies under date of April 14 that as she did not wish to trust to her memory in regard to the matter, having no date by her, she wrote to Judge Thayer Melvin, of the U. S. Court at Wheeling, W. Va., who was captured and taken to Libby prison with Gens. Crook and Kelley, being at the time a member of General Kelley's staff. She adds that Gen. Crook at once upon his return from Richmond rejoined her sister at Cumberland, which was and had been within the Federal lines at the time of his capture. She encloses me the reply of Judge Melvin to her request for information upon the subject. Under date of April 12 he writes her:

"'I regret that I am not able to give definite information concerning the exchange of Gens. Crook and Kelley. The records I never saw, and they are probably unavailable; and while doubtless I have had talks with both, the knowledge thus obtained has very largely faded with the years.

"'These officers, with myself and others held in Libby, were paroled for exchange in March, 1865, they being directed to report to Gen. Grant, at City Point; this, as was understood at his instance, he desiring to confer with Gen. Crook, perhaps; somehow or other I was included, being on the staff of one of these officers. We remained there for a night and part of a day and were given leaves of absence pending exchange. Certainly Gen. Kelley and myself were so given leaves, but I am not so certain as to General Crook. It is possible that he was exchanged at once, but my recollection is otherwise. But my distinct impression is that Gen. Grant

THE RIVER.

Softly the breath of morning steals faint across the sky,
Silently back to cloudland the chilling vapors hie,
And out of the chaos of darkness another day is won,
While careless of the wonder, the river floweth on.

The day mounts high and higher, the heavens melt to brass;
Along the glaring highway the weary people pass,
Faint with their ceaseless toiling and drooping 'neath the sun,
Unconscious that the river still tirelessly flows on.

The sky fades back to golden then blanches into gray,
With purple shadows creeping across the western way,
The day deeps into darkness, its race is fairly run,
But the great insistent river still pause-
lessly flows on.

Youth hath its dawn of promise: manhood its stress and strain
When the sun beats hot from the zenith and the goal is hard to gain,
But age and death and twilight come when the day is done,
And we lie at rest unmindful that the river floweth on.

The Afghanistan Mastiff

By Q. K. Underwood.

GANNON bought the dog from the keeper of a malodorous little shop, where birds, monkeys, cats and other pets were kept for sale. He went there to buy goldfish for his maiden aunt, who lived in the country, and he had no notion of investing in a dog, but such a friendship sprang up between him and the brute that he couldn't resist.

Gannon claims that the dog asked him to buy him as plainly as a person could without the use of articulate speech, but dog owners are as keen to discern and exploit the wisdom of their pets as mothers are to interpret the gurglings of their babies, and allowance must be made for this peculiarity in Gannon. But Jim, as the dog was christened, developed into a remarkably knowing animal. There was no apparent end to his ability to learn, and Gannon's ingenuity in teaching him tricks. Everything possible to a dog of his giant physique, he did, and Gannon set as much store by him as though he were human. He acted as bodyguard for his master, whose office was in Real Estate row, and could be trusted to carry a note to anyone of a dozen or more places. His size, and saturnine countenance insured him respectful treatment from strangers, and his amiability made him popular with persons who knew him. Still he was not a dog to encourage close friendships. He was uniformly affable, but for Gannon alone he seemed to cherish an abiding affection. If they were separated Jim would not eat, and at a word from Gannon he would have launched his big carcass at a wild elephant.

Their friendship had endured two years when Jim performed the feat that brought him the broad silver collar that he wears. Two highwaymen attacked Gannon, and Jim broke the right arm of one of them, and Gannon shot the other with the revolver that Jim's prisoner dropped. The robbers were criminals of note, and Jim and Gannon got much fame out of the exploit, but neither seemed jealous of the other.

It was soon after this that Gannon saw The Woman. Jim was not with him, and if he had been the result would have been the same. For Gannon lost his heart as soon as his eyes rested on her. Her skin was as smooth and soft as the sunkissed side of a peach, and the gleam of the topaz was in her eyes. Her personality was burned into Gannon's brain and heart. He went to his office with her image just behind his eyeballs. Half forgotten bits of verse and fragments of love songs struggled for utterance on his lips. He hadn't spoken to her. He might never see her again, but she was The Woman. He might marry another, but hers would be the image in his inner heart.

When Gannon saw her next Jim was with him. She was coming from a department store. Gannon gazed on her as long as he could without attracting the attention of the policeman stationed on the corner to discourage the mashing industry. He revolved in his mind divers possible and impossible schemes for forming her acquaintance. He wanted to turn back the hand of time 600 years or so and wear her glove bound to his helm and poke holes in many iron-clad gentlemen for wearing the gloves of other ladies. He wanted to rescue her from a burning building or be shipwrecked with her.

Jim evidently shared Gannon's opinion that she was a nice woman to know, and not being bound by the conventions of human society, he proceeded straightway to show his approval. The Woman was startled when Jim nudged her gloved hand with his big muzzle, but when her eyes met his she read a friendly intent in them, and gave him a reassuring pat.

"Why, he looks like Hector," she said to the girl with her.

The girl, who was thin, and didn't look healthy, shrank away from Jim, and said: "Please don't. The brute might bite you."

The Woman laughed and walked on. Jim circled playfully around her as though of a mind to accompany her. A whistle from Gannon brought him to heel, and The Woman said to the thin girl: "That man must own the dog. I've half a mind to ask him if he would sell him. He's such a fine-looking creature."

"Why, Ellen! Speak to a strange man on the street? I'm shocked."

"All right, dear, I won't; but I'd like to own him."

"The man?" said the thin girl, whose thinness was partially caused by her temper.

The Woman made no answer, and the two got in a handsome victoria drawn by a pair of nervous bay horses.

Gannon and Jim proceeded to Broadway, and stopped to look at a trick bicyclist in bizarre raiment darting in and out among the vehicles and bearing an advertisement of a dentifrice.

"That feller'll wind up by skeerin' some man's hoss," said a countryman.

"I shouldn't wonder," replied Gannon, passing on with his mind on The Woman. He and Jim were two blocks farther on when the sound of a runaway team's fast-flying hoofs striking the granite pavement came to his ears. Turning, Gannon saw a pair of bay horses tearing down the street with a victoria swaying behind them. The coachman was doing his best, but the horses were beyond his control. As Gannon looked, he saw two ladies in the carriage. One was The Woman!

"Here, Jim!" called Gannon, dashing into the street. "Catch, boy! Stop 'em!"

Among the accomplishments that Gannon had drilled Jim in was throwing a bullock. He did it on a wager to humble the pride of a stockyards man, who claimed to have the best cattle dog that ever headed a steer. It was a pastime that Jim reveled in, and as soon as he saw the runaway horses and heard Gannon's cry, he knew what he had to do. Deploying in the path of the team, Jim waited with every muscle tense, his big red tongue hanging out, and his eyes glowing like fire. He let the horses get within 20 feet of him, then bounding forward to meet them sprung for the muzzle of the nearest. The white fangs sank into the delicate skin of the horse's nose, and the full weight of the canine giant was thrown downward and backward towards the bay's knees. The overcheck rein snapped, and the horse went down with Jim between his legs. The coachman was thrown forward and nearly broke the other horse's back. Gannon and a dozen other men crowded around the horses. Jim was badly hurt, but held to the horse till he heard Gannon's voice ordering him to let go. Then he limped to his owner and wagged his tail feebly but proudly.

"Pardon me, sir; are you the owner of the dog that stopped those horses?"

Gannon told the stout old gentleman who had addressed him that he was.

"I want to thank you, sir, and the dog, too. I am Mr. Chesbrough—Nicholas Chesbrough, and those ladies whose lives your dog saved are my daughter and my niece. What is your name?

Gannon gave the stout old gentleman his card, and said he was happy to think that his dog had been of service, and hoped the ladies were not hurt.

"Not a particle; not a particle. Here they are now."

Gannon was introduced to The Woman, and the thin girl, and Jim licked the hand of The Woman with undisguised affection.

"He acts as if he knew you," said Gannon.

"I do believe he is Hector," said The Woman. "I had a dog just like him, and he disappeared two years and a half ago, just before we went to Europe."

"Jim, do you know this lady?" said Gannon.

Jim barked joyfully.

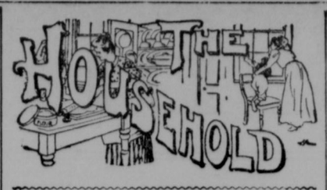
"Possibly he is your dog. If he is—"

"No; you mustn't say you'll give him up," interrupted The Woman. "But you'll bring him to see us, won't you?"

And Gannon did, not once, but often, and now when The Woman goes for a stroll Jim walks with her.

Napping on the Bench.

By the decision in the Illinois appellate court that a judge may take a nap on the bench without invalidating the proceedings a witty rejoinder of the late Senator Evarts is recalled. It was in the state constitutional convention of 1867, and the proposition was to retire all judges at the age of 70. Martin I. Townsend, of Troy, the combative Round-Head of the bar and stump, told of having seen the venerable Chancellor Walworth asleep on the bench. "The honorable gentleman does not tell us," said Mr. Evarts in reply, "whether he was present as counsel or as a spectator on the occasion of which he speaks so feelingly, but it is well known to the members of the bar that the venerable chancellor never slept when anything was transpiring worthy of his attention."—N. Y. World.



WAS ALWAYS HUNGRY.

Why Mrs. Kennett Sought Refuge in the Pantry After Her Guests Had Said Good Night.

Mr. Kennett is a genial and well-meaning man, but he is unobserving. This failing of his on occasion reduces his wife to the state of exasperation which most women understand unless they are married to trained detectives or the exceptional man who is too good to be true.

It is a standing joke at the Kennett house to remark on Mrs. Kennett's appetite. Her husband treasures the topic as a subject to enliven any informal dinners they give, and invents fresh stories on the spur of the moment if the conversation lags. "You wouldn't think now," he often says in mock wonder, "to look at such a fragile little person" (Mrs. Kennett is five feet four and weighs about 100 pounds) "that she eats twice as much as I do. Yet I'm always through a meal half again as quickly as she and she is perfectly brazen about making me wait till she has finished. I can't understand it!"

Guests always laugh ripplingly at this sally, and Mrs. Kennett smiles in a deprecatory way and holds her peace. There were a lot of friends in to informal Sunday night tea a short time ago, and in consequence a side table was devoted to the Kennetts' five olive branches and two visiting youngsters. Everybody waited on himself, and between whiles Mrs. Kennett attended to the side table.

Her portion of cold turkey had just been set before her when a wail arose from the junior table.

"I've drunk all my milk and I want some more," announced Tommy Kennett.

"And I want another slice of bread and jam," added a six-year-old visitor.

"Can't I have an olive?" piped the baby.

Mrs. Kennett arose to still the tumult. "Dear, dear!" sympathized a guest, "your coffee will get cold."

"Oh," said Mr. Kennett, genially, "she is used to that sort of thing. Won't you have this wing?"

Mrs. Kennett retied two bibs, rescued the sugar bowl and then dropped into her chair smiling and breathless. She enjoyed two bites of turkey and then had to arise and umpire a fight between Mildred Kennett and Harry, whose idea of warfare was to plaster his enemy with jelly. When she got back the rest of the adults were finishing some salad and had proceeded to the cakes and sliced fruit. She relinquished her turkey with a sigh in order to catch up with the procession, and had succeeded in getting the French dressing distributed over her tomatoes when clamor again arose.

'Please, mamma, s'more bread!" shouted Harry.

"Me, too!" cried Mildred.

"And I want a fork like Tommy's," wailed a visitor. "It's bigger'n mine!"

"My turkey's all gone," chimed in Tommy.

"And I'd like s'more milk," confided the chorus.

Mrs. Kenneth patiently arose and ministered to the tyrants. It took some time. When she had them settled, her husband and friends at the big table had finished.

"Oh, dear, yes," Mrs. Kennett said protestingly, when one of the guests "guessed she hadn't had a thing to eat," "I've quite finished!"

She led the way into the parlor and entertained her guests brilliantly till ten o'clock, when they departed. Then she disappeared.

Mr. Kennett, instituting a search for his wife, found her in the pantry with a heaping plate of cold turkey, jelly and cake.

He laughed amusedly. "Well, of all things!" he remarked. "Are you hungry after that layout we had three hours ago? Look out, Betty, you'll have to reduce your weight in a year if you keep on!"

Mrs. Kennett held a large and solid drumstick in her hand. For an instant her fingers clenched as do those of one about to hurl an object, and her eyes flashed. Then she thought better of it and instead ate the drumstick.

She says it would be a pity to destroy Mr. Kennett's childlike wonder at her marvelous appetite.—Chicago Daily News.

Scale of Good Wifeship.

Robert Burns, the poet, divided the scale of good wifeship into ten parts: Good nature, 4; good sense, 2; wit, 1; personal charms, 1. The remaining two degrees covered fortune, education, family blood, etc.

ART IN EMBROIDERY.

Design for a Photograph Frame Which, If Well Executed, Is Sure to Give Satisfaction.

The delicate quality which a well-known writer on the subject has aptly defined as finesse in embroidery is characteristic, when worked of this charming design. The inspiration was one of the exquisitely worked waistcoats which, during the latter half of the eighteenth century, were dear to the heart of the man of fashion, and equally satisfactory to the embroideress of the day as affording scope for her skill. Succeeding generation workers have good reason to be grateful for the storehouse of treasures which this pleasing mode of our ancestors has bequeathed to us, and which is equally inexhaustible as a source of instruction or of suggestion. Every variety of refined and delicate stitchery was called into requisition to suit the fashionable fancy, and the dandy of the period, as M. Ernest Lefebure tells us, and as examples preserved in museums and private collections testify, used even, when he felt he had exhausted European resource, to send his coats and waistcoats, ready cut, to be embroidered in China; so that not only does his luxurious wardrobe remain as an object lesson to the worker of to-day in the needlecraft of her own country, but sometimes introduces her to some of the finest methods and styles of oriental embroidery. The specimen on which the design is based is a delightful example of English embroidery of some century and a half ago, preserved at the Victoria and Albert museum, London. The ground is a creamy white satin, and the silks used the very finest floss; the whole piece is, indeed, a marvel of fineness, needle-painting of the most delicate type. Very fine threads of filo-floss might be used nowadays for working it, care being taken to select the shades together so as to be sure that they harmonize. The light trelliswork, for example, is in the soft plum-bloom color, best described by its old-fashioned name of "puce," the dull tone of which, even when fresh, makes it blend so restfully with other hues. The small flowers intersected by the trellis are in pale silvery blue, and the little sprays filling the spaces are crimson flowered, with green leaves and stems. The quaint posy at one corner introduces a delightfully varied combination of colors. The curious flower, with its cluster of small blossoms surrounding tall, upstanding stamens, is worked in blue, shading from the palest to a deep, dull indigo; the stamens are in light green tipped with maize and coral tints. The poppy shades from red to flesh pink; the small shower spray of flowers at the lower part of the bouquet is blue, while the pansy-shaped blossom above it shows delicate shades of pale mauve. The foliage is in greens, finely shaded from light to dark, and there is a touch of crimson in the flower-head standing erect above the others.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Evolution of the Wrapper.

Time was when the wrapper played such an important part in the comic papers and was such an untidy garment that it was banished from any correct outfit; but the dainty wrappers of to-day and the pretty matinees make a charming style of morning dress and one that is comfortable and appropriate. The kimono and such flowing garments should be relegated to the bedroom, but a pretty wrapper, with a fitted lining, may have loose fronts and a Watteau plait in the back, and yet not look in the least untidy or too negligee. The crepons, cashmeres, challies and India silks are all good for these wrappers, especially in light colors. White is the smartest, of course, but soils too easily to make it practical for the majority of women. White lace should be used in trimming all wrappers, for as soon as it becomes in the least soiled it may be taken off and washed or cleaned, and in this way is a much better trimming than ribbon or chiffon, which rarely look the same after cleaning.—Harper's Bazar.

Laughter Promotes Health.

There is not the remotest corner or little inlet of the minute blood vessels of the human body that does not feel some wavelet from the convulsions occasioned by hearty laughter. The life principle of the central man is shaken to its innermost depths, sending new tides of life and strength to the surface, thus materially tending to insure good health to the persons who indulge therein. The blood moves more rapidly, and conveys a different impression to all the organs of the body, as it visits them on that particular mystic journey when the man is laughing, than it does at other times. For this reason every hearty laugh in which a person indulges tends to lengthen his life, conveying as it does, distinct stimulus to the vital forces.—N. Y. Weekly.

TO FOUND AMERICAN COLLEGE.

Dr. Jenks, of Indianapolis, Will Establish Institution of Learning in Honduras.

Rev. Dr. Joseph S. Jenks, formerly rector of St. Paul's Episcopal church at Indianapolis, and connected at one time with Griswold college in Indiana, left New Orleans the other day with a faculty of teachers and instruments, apparatus and supplies for the establishment of an American college for girls at Santa Cruze de Yojoa, Honduras. Four years ago Dr. Jenks visited Honduras on a pleasure trip, when he found that all the better class of natives wanted their girls to be given an American education and taught the English language, believing that it was the destiny of the country to become some day a part of the United States. Upon the solicitation of leading citizens of Honduras, including two former presidents, Dr. Jenks was induced to open a school at Santa Cruze. The idea of an American education has so spread since then that 28 rich Hondureans have subscribed enough to build an American college for girls, the balance necessary for the operation being given by the government.

Corn Soup.

One can of corn, one quart and two gills of milk, three tablespoonfuls of butter, two scant tablespoonfuls of flour, one large tablespoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of pepper, one tablespoooonful of minced onion, yolks of two eggs. Chop the corn very fine and let it cook in a double boiler with one quart of milk for 15 minutes. Put the butter and onion into a frying pan and cook slowly for ten minutes, then add the flour and cook until smooth and frothy, taking care not to brown it. Stir this into the milk and add salt and pepper, and cook ten minutes. Rub the soup through a sieve and return it to the fire, and then add the yolk and two gills of milk. Let it stand one minute before serving.—Good Housekeeping.

A Watchmaker.

The late Aaron Dennison was called "the father of American watch making." He was interested in his work, because he hoped thereby to benefit his fellow men. Often he worked late into the night, so late that his loving wife would go and beg him to "wait until to-morrow." One night she said to him: "Are you not going to bed at all? What are you doing?" And he turned and slowly answered: "I am trying to make it possible for every poor man to have a watch"—a result which he very nearly accomplished.—Youth's Companion.

California's Treasures.

The California Miners' association has recently published a treatise on the mineral wealth of that state which brings out some facts that are not generally known. Gold, of course, holds the lead, but it will probably surprise many to learn that the value of the quicksilver annually produced in California is 50 per cent. greater than the value of the silver found there, and that even the petroleum output of the state exceeds the silver production in value. Copper and borax rank among the important minerals of California.

Q. E. D.

A man who called himself a "demonstrator" invaded a West Philadelphia boarding house patronized by university students. Hearing of his claims to educational distinction the students tried to draw the newcomer into conversation, and finally he was asked to show what kind of practical work he could do. Immediately the young man pulled out a box of white paste, smeared it on a window pane and polished the glass with a chamois skin. "There, gentlemen," he said, "if anyone can make a clearer demonstration than that let him step up." The students notified the landlady that it was not professional for this kind of a demonstrator to pose in their midst, and the stranger shook the dust from his feet against all in that house and solemnly announced that he left them to do the dust of ages. Turning to a dental student, he exclaimed: "I throw it in your teeth that when I have sold all my territory and am riding in my coach the dust of my chariot wheels shall extinguish you as you trudge along the pave!" With this awful imprecation he took his clothes and went.—Philadelphia Record.

Asking Too Much.

A Louisville man is considered a sort of authority on all literary topics. He is constantly consulted, and recently a dude went after him for information on a certain topic. The man of letters kindly gave it. But somehow or other his dudelets was slow to catch on. He wanted to know the why and wherefore of a lot of things connected with the subject. Why was it thusly, and wherefore was it not so and so? The literary man explained and explained until he grew weary. Finally his boredom and irritation overcame his politeness. "Sir," he thundered, angrily, "you come to me for information on this subject. I give you the facts, but, Heaven knows, I cannot give you the brains to grasp them. You ask too much."—Louisville Times.

RESULT OF AN INVESTIGATION

It Leads a Christian Physician to Take a Positive Stand Against Alcoholic Liquors.

Dr. Harold Remington was the son of a man so rich that it seemed wholly unnecessary for him to do anything more laborious than to keep track of the investments which fell to his share. He was singularly unspoiled by the money which was his inheritance, and the forceful activity of healthful young life had created in him a desire to make a place for himself in the world.

Having been graduated from a co-educational school he had quite naturally selected one of his schoolmates for a wife, and for reasons of their own they had chosen this town rather than a large city for their field of labor.

There was little in Harold's education, intellectual or religious, which developed in him any sense of personal responsibility for the unfortunate in life. He did his work carefully and conscientiously, charging up his poor patients to the benevolent fund, and was in a fair way to get used and hardened to social distress, as he had to physical pain, when something happened.

The doctor and Helen had settled themselves one evening for the quiet talk which was their rest and comfort after the day's labor, when he observed signs of excitement about her, and persuasively asked:

"Well, what is it? I see you have something on your mind."

"O Harold! it is such a dreadful thing. You know I told you that the German woman who comes to help the housemaid with the washing and cleaning was such a bright woman. I've often wondered why she had to work so hard. This morning she came with her eyes all red with crying to tell me that she didn't believe she could wash to-day. I asked her what was the matter, but she didn't want to tell. Of course I knew there was some trouble, and I insisted on knowing. I took hold of her arms to make her sit down and she cried out as if it hurt her, and then dropped into a chair and cried as if her heart would break. I couldn't do a thing but wait till she got quiet, and then she broke out in German and told me how her man had beaten her and showed me her arms pounded almost to a jelly."

ALCOHOL THE CAUSE OF IT.

"Harold," said Helen, suddenly, straightening herself and looking him keenly in the face; "you drink wine sometimes, don't you?"

Harold laughed heartily. "Why, sweetheart, are you afraid I'll beat you?"

"Nonsense!" she said, leaning back in her chair with narrowing eyelids, as if she were scrutinizing something closely. "You don't suppose I think you capable of that; but what is it about the stuff that makes such brutes of men?"

"I don't know," said Harold, indifferently. "Probably the beast is in the man by nature and the liquor rouses it to activity."

Helen was silent, but her steadfast gaze remained fixed on the opposite wall until her husband turned it toward him, exclaiming:

"What a brown study! Why don't you tell me what it's all about?"

"It's the poor woman and her trouble. I wish I could do something for her."

"I guess you can; trust you to cheer her up."

"Yes, but I mean something more than that. What can be done for her while he is like that? Say, dearest! let's study up alcohol. I hear it's in the public school course, but you and I don't seem to know very much about it."

Of course Harold could not refuse such a pleader, but truth to tell he did not feel any great interest in the subject. Drunkenness was utterly disgusting to him. It had been his pride that he had never been overcome by liquor, and he often declared that a gentleman ought to be above such weakness.

But Helen threw herself into the business with a zest, getting scientific opinions and verifying them as far as possible in the laboratory.

After the investigation had been going on for some time and the counts against alcohol had multiplied appallingly, Helen inquired one evening with a roguish smile:

"Harold, do you believe alcohol ever did any good?"

Harold pulled his mustache thoughtfully for a moment and then replied, soberly enough:

"No, my dear, I honestly don't, and I've sworn off, for I'm persuaded a Christian man can't afford to have anything to do with it, and I've made up my mind that I can just about do without it in medicine, too."

Helen's eyes dilated and brightened, as she exclaimed enthusiastically: "You blessed man! I knew you'd find a way to help. And how about the saloons; do you think a Christian man ought to vote for them?"

"No," said Harold, positively, though he remembered that the saloon had not heretofore entered into his political calculations. Indeed, politics had never interested him very much, but he saw that as a Christian he had a duty to perform there, and he was not the man to shirk a duty when it was made clear to him.

On another evening Harold reported a case from which he had just returned where a baby had been born of drunken parents in the midst of horrible conditions, and it had a depression in the skull which made it certain it could never be up to the average mentally.

"I tell you," said he, "I hated to see the little creature live. It's sure to be a curse to the world. I'm not sure but drunkenness is responsible, through heredity, for the biggest part of our defective and criminal classes."

"Why," said Helen, "it is what the Bible says: 'The iniquities of the father shall be visited upon the children to the third and fourth generation,' and you remember, Paul said: 'If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy,' and he says, too, that the baby is 'the temple,'" and she shuddered at the thought. "Holiness is wholeness of body as well as of soul," went on Helen.

"Glorify God with your bodies," said Harold, softly.

Helen laid her hand on his and said, reverently: "Let it be our work for Jesus to make our young friends understand this."—Carrie L. Grout, in Union Signal.

DRINKING IN BOER ARMY.

It Is Always and Strongly Discouraged—Splendid Results of Total Abstinence.

The fighting Boer has always discouraged whisky drinking, and the present war is no exception to the rule, as the following, by Fritz v. d. Straaten, in the Sud-Afrikanische Korrespondenz, shows:

"In the Boer army liquor drinking has been prohibited from the beginning, and smuggling prevented as much as possible. The rule has worked well. Our men have been in the saddle hundreds of miles at a stretch and in all sorts of weather, yet none 'caved in.' We had no hygienic uniforms, many had not even warm overcoats; yet the cold nights and hot days did not hurt the men. I have asked many medical men about the matter, and nearly all attributed the remarkable physical endurance of the Boers to their abstemiousness. It has been said that liquor will assist one in bearing fatigue. Not a word of it is true. Once during the campaign on the Tugela I, with a few comrades, reached an abandoned farm. The sun was sinking. We had been in the saddle since daybreak, without food or drink. Nothing eatable was in the house, but one of the men found a bottle of Cape brandy. Everyone shared the find except an old cattle Boer. And the result?—all who took a drink were in a raging fever half an hour after. Despite all the hunger and thirst I had experienced, I never felt so bad during the whole campaign. Had we met any Britishers when we continued our ride, the old Boer who refused to drink would have been the only one able to fight. It is absolutely false that liquor raises the courage. The only result it has is to make men more careless. This may have been of some value in the old days of hand-to-hand fighting; but what is wanted to-day is iron nerve, a clear eye, quick decision. I will only add that the Europeans, on the Boers' side, felt no bad effects from being deprived of liquor."—Literary Digest.

A man who has just retired from the employ of the Pennsylvania railroad after 50 years of continuous service as a night watchman declares that he is the luckiest railroad man on record. He has never been reprimanded, never met with an accident and never caused one. On the other hand, he once stopped the Philadelphia express on the edge of a washout, and saved 200 lives. In spite of many temptations, an oath never passed his lips during all his years of service, and he has never used tobacco or tasted liquor. Perhaps his efficiency and freedom from accident were not due entirely to luck.—Youth's Companion.

Ether Drinking in Prussia.

To the evils of alcohol are now added the evils of the ether drinking, which has spread alarmingly in eastern Prussia, where ether is sold in the saloons, like any liquor, four or five grams to a glass. In the town of Memel alone it is stated the amount thus sold last year was 8,580 liters, and in reality twice this amount was consumed, the rest brought in by smugglers. The effect is said to be four times more powerful than any equal amount of alcohol, but its continued use produces intolerable suffering and incurable lesions of liver, kidneys and heart.—Canadian Royal Templar.

In Verdi's will occurs this curious clause: "In the dining-room of my villa, St. Agata, will be found two large wooden boxes of great antiquity. I desire that neither shall be opened, but that both be burnt immediately after my obsequies."

Hereafter the Baltimore & Ohio railroad will not engage engineers weighing 200 pounds or over, although those now in the employ of the company will not be dismissed for this cause. The reason for the rule is said to be the narrowing of the space for the engineer caused by the extension of the boiler through the cab of the newer types of engine, and large engineers might not be able to move rapidly enough in emergencies.

DECORATION NOTES.

Pretty Novelties That Are in Favor In Home Ornamentation.

Never in any previous season have there been shown handsomer lamps and shades or globes than during this first winter of the new century, and never were such lamps sold at such moderate prices as now, says the Ladies' World, New York.

A beautiful lamp in royal copper finish, set in a frame of wrought iron and banded with this refined metal, has the shape of a classic urn with two handles, lions' heads with rings held in their open jaws. The shade for this lamp is ribbed and looks almost black until the lamp is lighted, when it sheds a deep, soft crimson glow of light.

Another beautiful lamp is of different material—a heavy thick opaque glass in the style known as cameo. This lamp has the color of the bloom of the raspberry in its soft finish, and is also banded with wrought iron and framed in the same metal. The globe of this lamp matches the body, and is also of cameo glass.

A lovely lamp in apple-green cameo glass is set in a frame and decorated with bands of a dead-finished repousse silver. Another apple-green cameo lamp is finished by bands and frame of relief work in dead black iron. Both lamps have globes of apple-green cameo glass.

Exceedingly beautiful is the decorative Austrian glass of this season. Tall flagons of clearest green glass deeply cut at the four corners taper to a graceful top and have their bases finished to represent beaten gold. These flagons come in four sizth, the largest being fully 18 inches high.

HE DIDN'T GET ANY.

Story of the Boyhood Days of King Louis XIII. of France.

One day, when the dauphin, afterward Louis XIII., was five years old, the duke of Sully came out to St. Germain well supplied from the treasury with pocket-money for the dauphin, says Mrs. Lucy Crump in the Atlantic. The news of the superintendent's arrival set the whole household astir, eager for a share in the expected spoil. Mme. de Monglat hurried the dauphin into the great courtyard of the castle to receive Sully with as much honor as if he had been the king himself. To please the great man, the little prince put his enfants d'honneur and other attendants through a drill with their toy harquebuses and swords. At the end of the show M. de Sully gave the dauphin 50 crowns, which his mock soldiers seized out of his hands so quickly that he had scarce time even to feel them. At last but one piece remained, which he held fast hold of, in spite of the efforts of Mme. de Monglat's tailor to get it from him. "He he, he's trying to take it from me!" shouted the child. Mme. de Monglat took it, gathered together all the rest of the coins from the reluctant hands of their possessors and kept them all. The dauphin did not complain, but soon after he said: "But I, too, was a soldier, and I didn't get any money."

Herouard always maintained that a certain reluctance to both spend and give, which characterized Louis in later years, was the direct result of Mme. de Monglat's teaching and example.

Is Your Mind a Reservoir?

No young man can hope to do anything above the commonplace who has not made his life a reservoir of power on which he can constantly draw, which will never fail in any emergency. It is only the man of great reserve, the man who has converted his knowledge into power, who has ground every experiment into paint for the great canvas for life's picture, who will make his mark in the world. The very skill which enables a surgeon to save a life, in an hour of supreme crisis, has been purchased by years of preparation, of stern discipline.—O. S. Marden, in Success.

Absolutely Invaluable.

An expression of opinion from the consumer of any article is always superior to any expert testimony. Not long ago, Mr. William Cady, of Columbus, Mississippi, wrote: "During the past two years I have had frequent occasion to use Palmer's Lotion in my family for curing Tetter and Ringworm, and for healing obstinate little sores about the face, head and hands it is invaluable." Of course it is invaluable, because it is the greatest known cure for every form of disease that can be reached by an outward application. Nervous Prostration.

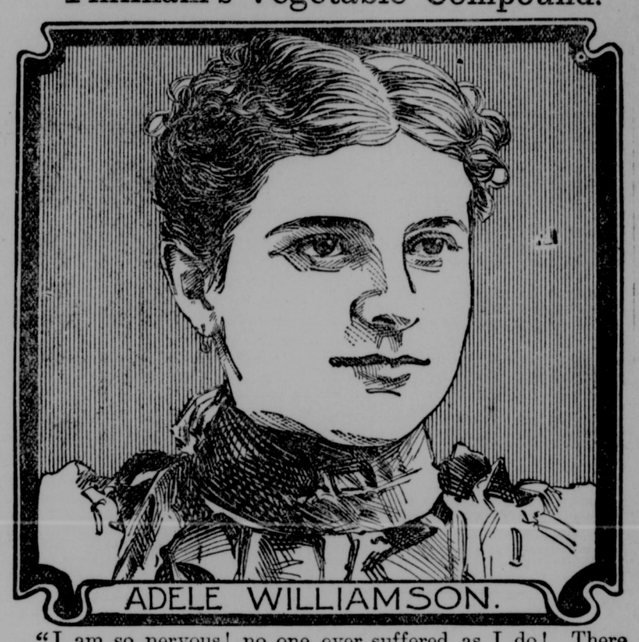
A Noted Boston Woman Describes its Symptoms and Terrors.—Two Severe Cases Cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.



ADELE WILLIAMSON.

"I am so nervous! no one ever suffered as I do! There isn't a well inch in my body. I honestly believe my lungs are diseased, my chest pains me so, but I have no cough. I am so weak at my stomach, and have indigestion terribly, and palpitation of the heart; am losing flesh; and this headache and backache nearly kills me, and yesterday I had hysterics.

"There is a weight in the lower part of my bowels, bearing down all the time, with pains in my groins and thighs—I can't sleep, walk, or sit, and blue—oh goodness! I am simply the most miserable of women."

This is a most vivid description of a woman suffering with nervous prostration, caused by inflammation or some other diseased condition of the womb.

No woman should allow herself to reach such a perfection of misery when there is no need of it. Read about Miss Williamson's case and how she was cured.

Two Bad Cases of Nervous Prostration Cured.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM;—I was suffering such tortures from nervous prostration that life was a burden. I could not sleep at all, and was too weak to walk across the floor. My heart was affected so that often I could not lie down at all without almost suffocating. I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and it worked like magic. I feel that your medicine has been of inestimable benefit to me."

MISS ADELE WILLIAMSON,

"I had nervous prostration terribly, caused by female weakness. I suffered everything; was unable to eat, sleep, or work. After a while I was induced to try Lydia E. I am simply a well woman."

FOR SHERIFF.

Newspaper Frauds.

"Non-partisan" papers, edited by partisans, are the most patent humbugs of the age. In commenting upon public matters they start out non-partisan, but wind up partisan. They are simply frauds. A partisan paper is the more to be admired. It sacrifices patronage for principle. It is more honest, for it does not play for both sides, and does not pretend to be anything than partisan. There is nothing antagonistic to honesty in being partisan, and there is every inducement to dishonesty in being non-partisan or independent. The most despicable object is a partisan who pretends to conduct a non-partisan or independent paper, and then by his acts endorses every principle and policy which his party espouses.—Westminster (Md.) Advocate.

SINCE it appears that the new election law does not prevent the illiterate voter from exercising the right of suffrage, as was clearly demonstrated at the election in Baltimore, it necessarily follows that the infamous scheme of calling an extra session of the Legislature at the expense $150,000 to the tax payers of the State, was a gross, inexcusable political outrage, and those who had a hand in promoting the infamy deserve and will receive the reprobation and contempt of every honest voter. What took place in Baltimore is only a mild zephyr to the storm that will drive the infamous leeches and Democratic schemers from power next November.

AFTER the Frederick election, the Democratic press of the State were disposed to predict party success throughout the State this fall, and claimed the result at Frederick showed the new ballot law to be in favor among the people. Since the Republicans have carried Baltimore city by 2,200, it is noticeable that the same papers insist that only local issues were involved in the election last Tuesday, and that it in no way effects the fall election. The Republicans are justly elated, however at their success in the big city. They have twenty-one out of twenty-eight members of the city council. The party will enter the State campaign with high purposes.

The Corrected Census.

The rectified census of Maryland is given out by the department as 1,188,044, or 2,006 short of the number of inhabitants originally named by the Census Bureau. This result is reached by subtracting the bogus names given in by the agents in three of the counties. It is proper, of course, to do this; but as the bureau has undertaken to rectify the census, it ought to ascertain the names which were inadvertently omitted in the original count, and add them to the sum total. While there may have been carelessness in taking the census, it is difficult to imagine that there was conscious fraud.

Many thousands of the people were absent when the census was taken, and a large part of them were out of the State and could not be counted. That this was so seems to be made evident not only from the municipal census, but from the registration lists. It has been claimed by the Census Bureau that the proportion of voters to inhabitants varies. While we are not prepared to controvert that assertion as a general proposition, it may be said with substantial accuracy that that proposition does not differ in old cities like those on the Atlantic border.

There are cities in the Central West and on the Pacific where this proportion varies, but it would require more than a theory to prove that a generally admitted statistical rule is wrong. But it is not necessary in the present instance to discuss such a theory, as the increase in the population of Baltimore has been established from two independent sources, and if the census is to be corrected by the subtraction of those who should not have been enumerated, it seems only fair that the corrections should go further and embrace those who were inadvertantly omitted and who are believed to number many thousands.

Sensible Words.

President McKinley appreciates the fact that all of the people are concerned in the questions of state recently solved or in a fair way to be solved and he knows that the people everywhere are personally interested as to the present and the future prosperity of the country, and his words are in line with the proper conception of his position as the chief executive of the greatest country on earth. From a few of his speeches made on Tuesday, we take the following paragraphs, as showing the general trend of the President's remarks, thus:

"What a mighty, irresistable power for good is a united nation of freemen. It makes for peace and prestige, for progress and liberty. It conserves the rights of the people and strengthens the pillars of the government, and is a fulfillment of that more perfect union for which our Revolutionary fathers strove and for which the Constitution was made.

"We can now supply our own markets. We have reached that point in our industrial development, and in order to secure a sale for our surplus products we must open up new avenues for our surplus. I am sure in that sentiment there will be no division, North or South. Our products are now going to every part of the world, from the North as well as the South, because what we produce is wanted.

"Our government rests upon the people, for they are sovereign. We are but your agents, the President and the Congress are but the representatives of the public will, and so long as the people are united, so long as their homes are virtuous, so long as the public schools of our country continue to educate the children in the paths of patriotism and loyality and intelligence and morality so long will this great government rest securely and advance triumphantly to the highest destiny."

A Demand For Good Roads.

It has been demonstrated that the twenty-five cents a ton which it costs to transport freight on the ordinary county road will carry the same freight 400 miles on a railroad and 1,000 miles on water. This means that the cost of transportation upon the country roads should be reduced, as it is prohibitive of farming operations at a distance from shipping points.

The farmer considers the quality of his soil and the character of the season vital elements in his prosperity, and so they are, but equally important is his ability to transport the product of his fields to market at a small cost. The cost of transportation can be reduced only through good roads, and though this is an old subject of discussion it will never become out of date until firm and easily traveled roadways lead to every farm house in the country. Public interest must be kept aroused until legislators and commissioners yield to the demand and commence the construction of a complete and durable system of highways.

Attention, G. A. R.!

HEADQ'TERS CROOK POST NO. 35, G. A. R., DEPARTMENT OF MARYLAND, OAKLAND, May 11, 1901.

Memorial services will be held at the Odd Fellows' cemetery, Oakland, May 30, 1901.

Crook Post cordially invites all old soldiers with their families, K. of H., Odd Fellows, Masons, school children and citizens to join with us on this memorial occasion to pay a loving tribute to our deceased comrades.

We will leave Grand Army Hall in Sturgiss building at 10.30 a. m. for cemetery.

Let there be a full turn out. Flowers for decoration will be thankfully received. Can be left at Sturgiss' drug store.

By order A. G. STURGISS, Post Commander.

J. A. HAYDEN, Adjutant.

New Time Schedule.

West bound.—No. 7, 2.42 a. m.; 3, 7.35 a. m.; 71, 10.01 a. m.; 55, 4.52 p. m.; 1, 10.07 p. m.

On Monday, June 24th, two additional trains will be put in service—No. 5, west bound, at 6.46 p. m., and No. 6, east bound, at 9.40 a. m.

ACCUSATIONS MADE BY MRS. BEATTY.

Against Her Murderer Husband Who Is Now Condemned to Die.

Mannington Advocate.

There are two sides to the J. W. Beatty murder case in Preston county and a theme and plot for a good novel could one unravel all the skein of tragedy and accompanying details. There appears to be a good deal of bad feeling between the murderer and wife, who seemed to desert him after the murder.

It will be recalled that Beatty, who is now in the penitentiary under a death sentence, slew his wife's brother, David A. Nine, not quite a year ago. The tragedy occurred on the Nine farm in Preston county. The editor of this paper had an interview with the murderer in his cell at the penitentiary, whereby it was shown that the man blamed the entire affair upon his wife.

Mrs. Beatty now comes back at her husband, in a letter sent to the Advocate, which appears below. She gives some startling facts, which, if true, shed more light upon the life of Beatty and his family. Yet all through her letter, it will be seen, there is much bitterness of feeling and vituperousness against the condemned man. The letter is as follows:

"AMBLERSBUG, W. Va., May 3, 1901.

"MR. EDITOR, DEAR SIR:—Please publish the following: Mrs. Mary Catherine Beatty, forced to protect herself, which she is going to do by ammunition prepared by John Wesley Beatty, the murderer, in years past, such as will hereafter be explained.

"It has been published that I had coaxed, plead, begged and would not give Wes any peace until he went and killed my brother, David A. Nine. Also that I had signed the petition to hang Wes. These reports are all false. Dave paid Wes his price for the timber. [Dave referred to is Mrs. Beatty's brother, the murdered man, and Wes referred to is her husband, the condemned man.—Editor.] Dave was an honest, upright, prosperous man from his own labor. Did not make his living by stealing from his neighbors as has been reported by some of the papers.

"Dave was an able man and a christian. He paid the preacher $11 just a day or two before he was killed, so it does not appear to me that he was much of a hog. Wes told me that Dave often wanted to pay him more for his blacksmithing than what he charged him.

"Dave was the first one to do for Wes in sickness and accommodated him at all times. The reputation of Wes published is good and to the effect that he was long suffering with everybody. That is NOT ALL SO EITHER. Wes once before reached for a gun to kill L. H. Goff and the party would not give it to him; then he threw his blacksmith hammer, striking Goff in the back.

"The night before Wes killed brother Dave he was in and out of bed and did not sleep and kept me awake. I knew that he was very angry about something. I was afraid to speak to him, knowing his awful temper and mean disposition.

"About sixteen years ago Wes got mad at me and hit me two licks with his fist and kicked me into the wood box. Then I said I would not live with him. Then he got his gun and I suppose he was going to kill me, so save my life, as I supposed, I said I would still live with him. He then laid the gun up, saying to me: 'See that you do.' The second daughter, very small, then put her arms about me, saying: 'Did old Wes hurt you? Did old Wes hurt you?'

"These are a few facts among many and can be proven. This is why I cannot help him. I did not ever expect to tell these facts, but since there is so much false report against me, I must defend my character a little.

"Respectfully,
"MRS. MARY C. BEATTY."

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Hon. Jacobs and son, of District No. 11, were visitors at the Park Saturday.

C. W. Conner, Esq., of Wheeling, spent the Sabbath and Monday at the Park. Mr. C. was one of the original founders of the Park.

A. R. Sperry, the retiring postmaster at this place, was postmaster for 19 successive years less three days. He was a faithful officer.

The Rev. Dr. Warden, of Terra Alta, is to take part in the opening exercises on June 1 and 2. By an oversight his name was omitted from the printed program.

Two or three good plasterers can find plenty of work at the Park.

L. A. Rudisill took possession of the postoffice Monday last. Mr. E. E. Friend will be chief clerk. He has made many friends by the courtesy shown the patrons of the office.

Saturday last Judge Cuppett inspected his twelve room house now in course of construction.

W. Brent Maxwell's new house is going up as if by magic. The contractor is a "rusher from Rushersville."

Mrs. S. A. Bond and daughter, of Buckhannon, arrived here Saturday.

Jacob Gower has taken the agency for the Oakland bakery and began last week to deliver bread, cakes, etc., at the cottages.

The News building is to be enlarged 12x18 feet so as to get more room in the hall on the second floor.

Mr. John Johns and wife returned from their visit to Ohio last week and are "at home" in their cottage.

D. W. Smith, Esq., and his mother-in-law, Mrs. Coulter, moved into "Braethorn." Mrs. Smith is still in Washington, D. C.

Miss Orange and Miss Webb, of Cincinnati, are pleasantly located in the Fullerton cottage.

Oscar Archer, wife and sister, of Ohio, arrived here Saturday and are "fixing" up for the summer in the Association house at the lake.

Miss Swan will have a new cozy six room cottage ready for occupancy by June 1st on her D street lot.

Miss Jennie Murphy has rented the Orum cottage on I street.

The camp meeting committee have published a neat and attractive illustrated booklet, full of information about the Twentieth Century Camp Meeting.

I wonder if the people are arranging to hear the eloquent pulpit orator, Dr. Edmund Mills, of New York city, on June 2nd, 11 a. m.? One can afford to travel miles to hear him. He also speaks Saturday night. Well, if they are not they will be sorry for it after the 2nd. He is great.

Every visitor at the Park expresses surprise at the amount of building going on at this place. In almost every direction one sees new houses going up.

We are going to be sweet this summer, because Garthright, "the Eli" merchant of this region, has a full car of sugar on the way to this station.

FIVE MONTHS OF CAMPAIGN.

Republicans Propose to Wage Big Fight in Maryland.

It is authoritatively stated that Chairman Goldsborough proposes to call a meeting of the Republican State Central Committee for the first week of June and preparations for the meeting are already under way.

Little will be done at the meeting except to set a date for the meeting of the State Convention, at which candidates for State Comptroller and Clerk of the Court of Appeals are to be nominated.

The calling of the State Central Committee together will mark the opening of the Republican fall campaign and means that there will be five months of preparation and work for the contest in November. There is already wide speculation as to the candidates to be named at the convention, and Baltimore Republican leaders assert that in view of the recent victory of the party in Baltimore the candidate for Comptroller should come from that city. The names of Gen. Thomas J. Shryock and Mr. John B. Ramsay have been mentioned as among the men best fitted for the position. A. Lincoln Dryden, of Somerset county, and ex-Congressman Barber, of Talbot county, are also be urged.

Among the men who are being mentioned in a speculative way with the nomination for Clerk of the Court of Appeals are ex-Secretary of State Richard Dallam, Thomas Parran, of Calvert county, and Senator Wilkinson, of St. Mary's county. Aside from these it is claimed the nomination should go to some young Baltimore lawyer.

That Mr. Goldsborough will remain chairman of the committee appears to be taken for granted.

Ex-Senator Gorman, it is said, has engaged rooms at the Eutaw House and will spend much of his time between now and election at Democratic headquarters directing the campaign.

SCOTT'S EMULSION

OF COD-LIVER OIL WITH HYPOPHOSPHITES

should always be kept in the house for the following reasons:

FIRST — Because, if any member of the family has a hard cold, it will cure it.

SECOND — Because, if the children are delicate and sickly, it will make them strong and well.

THIRD — Because, if the father or mother is losing flesh and becoming thin and emaciated, it will build them up and give them flesh and strength.

FOURTH — Because it is the standard remedy in all throat and lung affections.

No household should be without it. It can be taken in summer as well as in winter.

Off For Alaska.

John Shartzer, Esq., left Oakland Sunday afternoon for Washington, from which city he departed Monday for San Francisco, Cal. After remaining there for a few days he will sail for Nome, Alaska, from which point he recently received a letter containing very encouraging news for those who have interests there. The letter was written February 6th and stated that the Nome people had not then received any news of the election held last November. Provisions were cheap at Nome. Coal was selling at $80 per ton and hay at $280 per ton. The Penny Creek claim in the gold fields which is owned by the Maryland Mining Company of this county, promises to be a paying investment. An offer for it has been to the company by an experienced miner.

Religion sometimes does not reach the right spot, the heart. When we see a man or woman leaving the church because he does not like the preacher, and attending some other church, we say to ourselves, "that man's religion did not reach the right spot." Preachers are not supposed to be perfect, but they are generally very good men and the church member who has no charity in his heart and who cannot overlook some little shortcoming in the preacher is not fit to take the Lord's Sacrament. Religion in its fullness, if accepted by God's creatures makes a man a lovable being, possessed of a heart overrunnning with love. Men with vinegar dispositions must be regenerated and regenerated again before the banner of religion heralds to the world.

Judge Sloan, who was taken to Atlantic City last Thursday, is much improved in health. He was joined there Tuesday of this week by Mrs. Sloan.

The new soda fountain at Sturgiss' Pharmacy was put into successful operation on Tuesday night. The fountain is of the latest improved pattern and was built expressly for Col. Sturgiss.

Cow pasture is in great demand at present and the bovines of town are rejoicing in the great amount of which has been placed at their disposal. The milk and butter being sold in town shows the improvement due to the new provender nowadays.

New poles are being erected along Green and Second streets for the reception of wires for the Garrett County Telephone Company leading to the new central office in the Ravenscroft building. It is thought that the change will be effected some time the latter part of this week when a lady will be put in charge of the office which will insure a radical change for the better in the service for subscribers of the line.

And it came to pass that after he had advertised his goods there came unto him great multitudes from all the region around about and did buy of him. And when his competitors saw it they marveled among themselves saying: "How be it that this man is busy while we loaf about our doors?" And he spake unto them saying: "Verily, verily I say unto you, in this fast age of push and rustle it is easier for a camel to enter the eye of a needle than for a business man to florish without advertising."

The individual who gets the fewest letters makes the most complaint to the postmaster: the man who never had a good meal at home growls at the hotel accommodations; the person who complains most of his neighbors is the meanest of the lot; the church member who pays the least to the preacher's salary finds the most fault with his preaching, and always complains of the bad management of the church; and the subscriber who is the slowest to pay his subscription finds the most fault with the local papers.

The fruit crop throughout this county promises to be the largest in a number of years, there having been no frosts heavy enough to injure the buds which are now forming. Farmers are engaged in planting potatoes and getting their corn ground ready for seeding. The acreage of grain this year within the county, judging from reports received from our farmer friends, will be much greater than heretofore. Considerable new ground has been cleared and many meadows which have been in grass for years have been plowed and are being seeded in grain. Agriculturally Garrett county will be in the lead of Maryland counties before many years shall have passed.

County Surveyor Franklin P. Green is in town to-day on business.

Fast Driving Should Be Stopped.

Some of these days there will be an accident on the street here as a result of fast or careless driving on the part of some of our so-called horse fanciers. Second street from the Hinebaugh residence to the opera house seems to be the favorite stretch of road which at times, and especially in the evening when the matrons and their children are out for a walk, resembles a speedway. Within the past few weeks several accidents as a result of this practice have been narrowly averted. Some drivers think they have the exclusive right of way and utterly disregard the rights and safety of others. After an accident occurs is not the right time to take action in this respect. Now is the time for the practice to be broken up and we do not consider that we are a growler or kicker in demanding that it should stop.

Improvements Being Made at Webers' Gardens.

The horticultural firm of H. Weber & Sons, east of town, are making preparations to build another mammoth green house which will be when completed among the largest in the State. The house will be something like 200 feet long and nearly 30 feet wide and will require several thousand feet of glass. The firm is also erecting an addition to their saw mill and will instal a planer and other wood working machinery. The great demand for their products, especially carnations and roses, make these improvements necessary.

Loch Lynn Hotel Sold.

Col. Clarence Smith, of Fairmont, who is at the head of a syndicate, closed the deal one day last week for the purchase of the Loch Lynn Heights Hotel, the price agreed upon between the receivers and the company being something in the neighborhood of $12,000. The sale has not yet been ratified by the court and until it is nothing toward refurnishing and putting the property in shape for operation will be done.

Injured Near Crellin.

A Hungarian laborer employed by the Preston Railroad Company in construction work, was put to cutting away the roots of a large tree Monday when it fell unexpectedly, catching the man under it. His leg was crushed below the knee and he was otherwise seriously injured. He was brought to Oakland and placed in the McComas hospital where he was attended by Dr. Hinebaugh.

Total Eclipse.

One of the most remarkable of total eclipses of the sun will occur on Friday, May 17. The sun is then nearly at its greatest distance, consequently of the smallest apparent diameter, and the moon will be almost at its nearest approach to the earth, consequently of the largest apparent diameter. Hence the duration of the eclipse will be six minutes and twenty-six seconds, or more than three times that of 1898. Unfortionately, it occurs at about midnight here and will not be visable.

REV. BENJAMIN ISON, D. D.

The community of Oakland and the people generally of the entire West Virginia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church lost in the death of Dr. Ison, which occurred in Washington, D. C., on Sunday, the 12th inst., a man whose every action showed a true Christian spirit.

The deceased was born near Wellington, Shorpshire, England, Nov. 12th, 1824, and at the time of his death was aged 76 years and 6 months.

At the age of 16 years he commenced his ministery and continued in such work his entire life. When less than 20 years of age Dr. Ison came to the United States and entered the Pittsburg Conference of the M. E. church. When the West Virginia Conference was formed he was in that portion of the Pittsburg Conference which fell into West Virginia and thus became a charter member of the West Virginia Conference and remained a member until his death. Of the charter members but three survive Dr. Ison. His first charge in Garrett county was at Grantsville, where he preached nearly half a century ago and at the same time filled appointments at Kingwood, Morgantown and other remote places—in fact he was one of the old-time circuit riders. His experiences as such were many, the hardships endured great, but he has found his reward. After having been transferred from this immediate community and serving faithfully his church in other parts of the Conference he was returned to Oakland as pastor of the M. E. church in the year 1877. Later he was made presiding elder of this district and also of the Parkersburg district, besides filling other important appointments. In 1884 he was elected the first memof the West Virginia Conference delegation to the General Conference of the church. Since 1877, with the exception of a few years when he was serving other appointments Dr Ison made Oakland his permanent home. Some ten years ago the degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by the West Virginia University at Morgantown.

In 1850 Dr. Ison was married to Miss Ella E. Robinson, daughter of the late Joshua O. Robinson, of near Paw Paw, West Va., to whom three children, one daughter and two sons, were born, and is survived by the wife and two sons, Messrs. Willey O. and H. Allen Ison, of Washington.

Dr. Ison's health had not been good for a number of years but his last illness dated from the death of his only daughter, Miss Ella Ison, which occurred last December. In order to enjoy a mild climate for the winter he and his family have for a number of years spent the winter months in Washington, D. C., where the two sons reside.

The remains were brought to Oakland Monday afternoon and the funeral services were held in St. Paul's M. E. church Tuesday afternoon, conducted by Rev. A. Mick, assisted by Rev. John M. Davis and a number of visiting clergymen from other sections who were warm personal friends of the deceased and his family. The attendence at the funeral was quite large, showing the high esteem in which the deceased was held. The pall bearers were Messrs. A. G. Sturgiss, Scott T. Jones, Fred. A. Thayer, Claude E. Robinson (a nephew), Geo. M. Mason and E. D. Kepner.

The deceased was a member of the Masonic fraternity and was beloved by the brethren. It is safe to say that no one ever lived here whose life was considered a greater benediction than that of Dr. Ison Although he has passed away his memory will live and the good example set by him will be followed for generations.

Redemption of Stamps.

The law for redemption of uncancelled revenue stamps becomes effective July 1.

An inspection of the circular shows that unused documentary and proprietary stamps may be redeemed through the collector of internal revenue by whom they were sold, after deducting the percentage, if any, allowed the purchaser, but these stamps must pe presented in quantities of $2 or more.

Claims for redemption of adheisive stamps must contain a certificate of the collector or dealer selling them, giving date of purchase and amount, and damaged stamps must be satisfactorily accounted for. All claims for stamps imprinted on checks, drafts and other instruments must be forwarded by the collector of the district in which the claimant resides, with certificate and recommendation.

Big Fish Caught.

The News records, as a matter of interest to fisherman and others, the capture in the Potomac river by a resident of Brunswick of three carp, whose weights aggregated 76 pounds. It would with considerably greater pleasure report the capture of 76 carp weighing one pound each, and its pleasure would be greater still if the weight were divided among twice that many fish or even more. The greater the number of carp taken from the streams, the greater is the cause for fishermen to rejoice. — Frederick News.

Accident Wants a New School House and Should Have It.

Joseph A. Beeghley, Esq., one of the progressive farmers of Accident, came up to Oakland Tuesday morning to be present at the meeting of the School Board before which body he laid the need of a new school building at Accident. The present school house was erected many years ago and was built upon lines then in vogue for the erection of such buildings. It is lacking in comfort and sanitary arrangements and is in quite a dilapidated condition. The people of Accident are all progressive and are heavy tax payers. Their community is one in which the money for a new school house could be spent economically and at the same time would perform a public and needful service.

Hear the Man Eloquent.

To the Editor of The Republican.

I want to call the attention of the readers of THE REPUBLICAN to the 20th Century Opening at the Park, June 1-2. Saturday, June 1, 7.30 a platform meeting is to be held. There will be present at that meeting, Drs. Wardin and Jones, Rev. S. K. Arbuthnot, A. Mick and Harvey, Dr. E. Mills and Rev. John Weir, D. D. The leading speaker will be the wide-awake, enthusiastic president of the West Virginia Conference Seminary, Dr. Weir. The doctor is engaged to speak at a number of Chautauquas this summer. His Sabbaths are engaged for months ahead. He is a man "sought after." Then on Sabbath 11 a. m., the Rev. Edmund Mills, D. D., of New York City, is to be the speaker, a man in demand all over this great country of ours. He is a preacher eloquent, instructive. To hear him is a pleasure. Not to hear him is a misfortune. Rev. Arbuthnot will be glad to see his many friends and shake hands with them again. This opening exercise will be a treat of a lifetime.

A Boiler of a Sawmill Exploded.

The boiler at the sawmill owned by Ezra J. Thomas at Glade Farms, near Terra Alta, W. Va., exploded Wednesday afternoon, killing two men and badly injuring several others.

The boiler was blown about three hundred feet, carrying the off bearer, Frank Fearson, who was killed, along with it. He was horribly mangled, having been decapitated.

Ezra Thomas, the fireman, was so badly hurt that he only lived a few hours.

Frank Thomas, son of Ezra, was seriously hurt, as was William Barthlow.

Fearson leaves a wife and two small children.

CIVIL WAR INCIDENT.

desiring his services at once, negotiations were entered into looking to his exchange, perhaps, while he was a prisoner of war, certainly at or immediately after the day at City Point, and that these negotiations resulted in his exchange for General Trimble, C. S. A., not later than a few days after he reached Cumberland. My recollection is that having been exchanged, almost at once he assumed command of the Department of West Virginia under orders to the adjutant general's office, but was shortly relieved at the instance of General Grant, who assigned him to the command of a cavalry division in the Army of the Potomac, all this occurring before I reached Cumberland, being still on leave, some 12 or 15 days after our return. Hence my inability to give the exact date of his exchange and resumption of command. The others were exchanged in a few weeks, but in due course, under the regulations which then obtained, and without special arrangements, such as were made, I feel sure, in the case of General Crook.'

"The information is in accordance with my own impressions and those of most of the old soldiers of the Civil War with whom I have talked. The fact is that on more than one occasion during the Civil War, Northern soldiers who had become interested in Southern women were either taken prisoner or narrowly escaped it. The present writer came near having an experience of this kind on the Rappahannock in the winter of 1863-64, over which he has since been amused in talking with the lady and the gallant Confederate soldier who became her husband and who has but recently died.

"The readers of the Republican may be interested to know that years after the Civil War, Capt. Dailey visited his brother-in-law, Major General Crook, then commanding a department somewhere in the West, where he won great distinction as an Indian fighter, and where Capt. Dailey after a short illness died. After the death of Gen. Crook his widow and her sister for some time were proprietors of the "Glades," a famous summer resort at Oakland, and where Mrs. Crook died a few years since. The monument to her husband at Arlington Heights is one of the most beautiful in that famous cemetery."

The STAGE DRIVER'S Story

By Mary B. Sleight.

"THAT? Oh, that's old Squire Hone's place; at least, 'twas his once, and a mighty fine place it is, too," said "Capt. Bob," the stage driver.

I was the only passenger, and as the day was fine I was sharing his seat for a better view of the country. We were just then passing a large, old-fashioned mansion standing well back from the road and surrounded with magnificent elms and maples.

"Yes, it's a mighty nice old place," repeated the driver, "and it just does me good to see them youngsters froicking on that grass plot. Hullo! there's the old squire himself!" and he pointed with his whip handle to a shaggy-bearded old man who with the help of a crutch was hobbling down the steps. "Seems pretty badly broken up. And he used to be one o' the halest, heartiest men in Stantonville. I know I used to look up at him when I was a boy and think that the giants I'd read about couldn't have been much bigger. But the trouble with him was his inside make-up didn't fit the outside. It always seems to me when I see some o' them great gianty-lookin' men as if the Lord meant 'em to have hearts as big in perportion as their bodies, but they don't always; or if they were big once, they've got so badly shriveled up, some of them, that I should think they'd wabble 'round like a dried kernel in a walnut shell.

"My uncle Ben used to go to schooi with the squire when he was a youngster, and he says he was so mean that he wouldn't so much as give a fellow an apple core without makin' him pay back in chewin' gum, and when you see a boy so stingy as that you can most gen'ly tell about what sort of a man he is goin' to make. But he was an only son, and I s'pose that helped to spoil him. He had one sister, and when her husband died, leavin' her with two children and scarcely money enough to pay his funeral expenses, she begged her brother to let her come back to the old home; but she might as well have asked that big rock yonder to take pity on her. And 'twasn't long before the poor lady, not being used to hardships, broke down and died. Folks thought then that, maybe he'd be shamed into doin' something for the two orphans, seein' they were his own nephews; and he was; he took 'em both out o' school and 'prenticed 'em to a shoemaker. Generous, wasn't he? And he had but one child of his own, too, and she was a girl that would have been glad enough to have 'em for brothers. Her own mother was dead—as nice a woman as you'd care to meet; one o' your real ladies, with always a smile and a heartsome word for everybody; a good prayin' woman, too. Folks that knew her intimate use' to say that she was always prayin' for the squire, and that sometimes she'd send a note askin' to have him prayed for in meetin'. She didn't give in his name, but everybody knew who it was. But prayin' for a man like Squire Hone always seems to me a waste o' breath. Anyway, the poor lady died without seein' any good come of it, and 'twasn't more'n a year 'fore he was married again. The second wife was a good deal like himself, big and handsome, with no more heart than an oyster, and Annie, who was one o' them soft-eyed little things that always look as if they wanted a lot o' motherin', got to pinin' so that at last some of her mother's relatives over in Waterbury sent for her and kep' her till she was grown up. I remember as well as if 'twas yesterday the day she came back; I'd just begun drivin' the stage, and she was one o' my first passengers, a tall, slim-built girl, with a forehead like a baby's, and a look in her eyes that made you feel as if you wouldn't say a swear word before her no more'n you'd cut off your hand; and that's the kind o' girl that I like to have round when that off horse begins to get balky. Hi, there, Jerry! None o' your nonsense!" But the off horse was in a mulish mood, and there was a long break in the story.

"The squire'd been sort o' ailin' that spring," said Capt. Bob, when at last the balker was conquered, "and when Annie heard of it she hurried home to see if she couldn't cheer him up. And he was mighty well pleased to have her there, for he and madam didn't get on any too well together; and no matter how mean a man is, he likes havin' somebody to coddle him all the same, 'specially when he's sick. But when he found out that she was gettin' letters from a young feller in Waterbury, and was expectin' some time or other to marry him, he was madder'n a March hare, and swore that if she didn't give him up he'd cut her off without a penny. But Annie didn't take that part of it much to heart, for the young man was purty well to do, and as he wasn't through college they didn't feel in any hurry about marryin'. But as soon as he was ready to start out for himself he went right to her father, for he was a real straightforward sort of a feller, and told him he'd come to ask for Annie. For answer the squire ordered him to go about his business and wait till he was sent for. But at that Annie braced up and said that she had given her promise to marry him as soon as he was through college, and seein' she was of age she thought it wouldn't be right for her to break her word.

"'Oh, marry him! Marry him!' stormed the old squire, hard as a flint, 'but I warn you, not a cent will you get from me if you have to go to the poorhouse.' And Annie, feelin' that she wasn't beholden to her father in any way, seein' he'd let her live away from him so long, went back to Waterbury the next day and was married at her aunt's.

"'Long about that time there was a craze in this part o' the country for investin' in minin' stock, and the squire, though gen'ly a pretty shrewd business man, went into it hot and heavy. Fact, he was so greedy about it, he seemed to begrudge anyone else havin' a chance. But all of a sudden the mine caved in, so to speak, and the squire had a stroke o' paralysis that come mighty near making an end of him. And when they come to look into his affairs they found that his house and pretty much everything else that he owned had been mortgaged to raise money for the minin' stock.

"In the meantime his daughter had moved somewhere away out west, and there wasn't a soul to give the old miser a helpin' hand. But he'd had the sense to leave a few hundred dollars in the bank, and when the folks that held the mortgages shut down on him, his doctor took a room for him in a cheap lodgin' house and had him move into it. Seemed quite a come-down, but nobody pitied him very much.

"Well, to make a long story short, in the course of a year or two the county was voted a new poorhouse, and the Hone property being for sale the committee concluded it'd be cheaper to buy that than to build. You see, there was about 20 acres of land and not a neighbor within quarter of a mile. The squire had another stroke when he heard what they were goin' to do with it, and his landlord, findin' that by the time the doctor's bill was paid he wouldn't have a dollar left, turned him over to the town. I dare say the selectmen were sorry to do it, but of course they had to treat him the same as the rest o' the town poor; and when he came to himself there he was in his old home under an overseer, and herded with paupers.

II.

Two years later I chanced to be passing over the same road with Capt. Bob Moreley for driver.

"Say!" he cried, facing about as we came in sight of the Hone place, "'member my tellin' you 'bout the old squire? Well, sir, there's been great doin's up there, and they say the old man's so changed that his own wife wouldn't know him. Seems his daughter 'long 'bout that time lost her husband, and when some of her friends wrote her what the old gentleman had come to she packed right up and hurried on east with her little girl and took a house down in the edge o' the village so's to be near him. Tell you what, the way some women in this world forgive helps a fellow to understand the forgivin'ness of the Lord.

"But she hadn't more'n got here when she was taken down with rheumatic fever, and not bein' able to go herself, she sent her little girl over to ask about the squire. The old man was sittin' on one o' the benches there by the gateway, with his chin on his cane, when the little one come in, and he started as if he'd seen a ghost. They say she's the born image of her mother when she was her age, and she's named after her, too, and when her grandad called her Annie she run right to him and clumb on his knee and begun chatterin' as if she'd known him all her life. He's gen'ly rough as a bear with children, but they say he broke down and cried like a baby.

"Well, that little midget kep' comin' right along, bringin' flowers and jells and lovin' messages from her mother; and 'bout the first question she'd ask him would be: 'Have you said your prayers this mornin', grandpa?' And then she'd make him recite with her 'Our Father.' And before folks knew what was goin' on the old squire was converted. You know the Bible says: 'A little child shall lead 'em,' and it seems as if the Lord must have sent that little one there on purpose to bring him to repentance; at least, that's the way it looks to me. His daughter, soon as she was able to be up, wanted him to come live with her, but he was afraid he'd be a trouble and thought he'd better stay where he was. To be sure, he said, 'twas the poorhouse, but 'twas in the poorhouse that he'd found the way to Heaven."

At this point the off horse began to balk, and it was several minutes before the captain could go on.

"Queer," he remarked, as he settled back in his seat, "what ups and downs sometimes come to people. All of a sudden, one day, 'bout a year ago, the squire had a letter sayin' that a new vein had been struck in the mine that he'd invested in, and that the stock had doubled in value. Seems he'd been smart enough to hold on to the paper, so he was once more a rich man; and the first thing he did was to deed 20 acres of land to the county and buy back his home. Then he had the house put in order from top to bottom, and to-day his daughter Annie and her little girl are livin' there with him, and the two nephews that he 'prenticed to a shoemaker are bein' fitted for college. Curious, wasn't it, how it happened? Makes you think of old Nebuchadnezzer havin' to go down on his marrow-bones, and then gettin' back his throne after he'd learned his lesson. Anyhow, the squire's clothed and in his right mind at last, and I've come to the conclusion that his wife's prayers weren't wasted, after all."—N. Y. Independent.

A LAND OF MARVELS.

Prof. McGee Calls It the "Country of the Cacti."

Water Barrel of the Desert, Armed with Natural Fish Hooks—Plant Sacred to the Rain God—Giant of Plant Life.

The country of the cacti—weirdest of all regions on the earth, so far as its vegetation is concerned—was visited by Prof. W. J. McGee, of the bureau of ethnology, in the course of the expedition from which he has newly returned. He describes it as a land of marvels—a territory where the dominant forms of plant life are uncanny things armed with spikes and natural fishhooks. Some of them are of gigantic size, reaching 50 feet in height, and harboring strange inhabitants, such as little owls.

"This wonderland, much of which has never been explored, lies to the east of the Gulf of California, and to the west of the Sierra Madre mountains," said Prof. McGee to a New York Herald correspondent. "It forms a sort of triangle, the northern edge of which is in Arizona, but which is mainly covered by the state of Sonora, in Mexico. For the most part an inhospitable desert, it affords conditions more favorable to the development of cacti than are to be found anywhere else in the world.

"Desert plants are commonly obliged to store up water in one way or another, so as not to per'sh during the long periods when there is no rainfall. Various species of cacti do this, and in the region I describe the tired and thirsty traveler occasionally comes across a spiky thing, about the size of a beer keg, which is to him a godsend—perhaps even a rescue from death in hideous shape. It is the so-called 'water barrel of the desert,' a species of cactus which is a living spring, containing within itself a considerable supply of the purest water. One has only to chop off the top of it with a machete, when a mass of pulp is disclosed, somewhat resembling in consistency the pulp of a watermelon. If a bowl-shaped cavity be cut in the top of the pulp mass it will quickly fill with water, which may then be drunk. Or, if preferred, the pulp may be chewed.

"This water barrel cactus, when ripe, has a crown of fruits, the pulp of which is edible and grateful to a thirst that has been aggravated by alkali dust. The plant is the thorniest of all the cacti of the region, being provided with straight spikes and crooked spines that operate like fishhooks. It is for this reason, indeed, that the water it contains is pure and drinkable.

"Other cacti are protected by chemic ingredients in their juices, which make the latter unpleasant to drink, but this one is furnished with such formidable external and mechanical devices for protection against enemies that it does not find it necessary, as one might say, to poison its fluids.

"In the days of early exploration in the southwest the Cereus giganteus was the first of the great cacti to come under scientific notice. It was considered the most extraordinary product of the vegetable realm. Nevertheless, I have myself seen in the region of which I speak an immense forest of a single kind of cactus, larger than the Cereus gigantus and extending continuously over many square miles, practically to the exclusion of all other forms of plant life. This is the Cereus pringleii, known to the native Indians as the 'comb cactus,' because it furnishes them with combs for their hair. It attains a height of 50 feet, and when full grown has a trunk as large as that of the biggest oak tree.

"This cactus bears fruits in bunches resembling in appearance horse chestnuts, and it is the burrs that are used for combs. The branches show many little holes made by woodpeckers, which peck through the outer skin into the pulp and dig out cavities in the latter of a size and shape suitable for their nests. To heal a wound thus inflicted the plant exudes a viscid secretion that hardens into a woody substance, so that in a short time after the nest has been formed in the manner described it surrounds itself with a hard shell, perfectly clean and dry. When the cactus dies its pulp, which is largely composed of water, withers away, leaving behind only a skeleton of slender ribs representing the great branches; but the woody, bowl-like woodpecker nests remain intact and do not decay."

German Soldiers as Swimmers.

The German army has a swimming school for troops, where everyone must learn to swim. The best swimmers are able to cross a stream of several hundred yards' width, even when carrying their clothing, rifle and ammunition.

THE LAETARE MEDAL.

Famous Order Established by Indiana's Catholic University Goes to W. Bourke Cockran.

W. Bourke Cockran, the New York orator and lawyer, has been chosen this year by the faculty of the University of Notre Dame to receive the Laetare medal.

Eighteen years ago, when the faculty of Notre Dame determined to choose each year from the ranks of the Catholic laity of the United States a man or a woman conspicuous in furthering the interests of morality, education, citizenship, and to confer on him some tangible mark of honor that should bear witness of the approbation and sympathy of Notre Dame, Dr. John G. Shea, the historian, was chosen to be the first recipient of the medal. The list of subsequent names numbers some of the most prominent Catholic laics—both men and women—of the United States. Since 1883, the year in which Dr. Shea was the recipient, the following men and women have received the honor in the order named: Patrick J. Keeley, architect; Eliza Allen Starr, art critic; Gen. John Newton, civil engineer; Patrick V. Hickey, editor; Anna H. Dorsey, novelist; William J. Onahan, publicist; Daniel Dougherty, orator; Maj. Henry P. Brownson, soldier and scholar; Patrick Donahue, editor; Augustin Daly, theatrical manager; Gen. William S. Rosencrans, soldier; Anna T. Sadlier, author; Dr. Thomas A. Emmet, physician; Timothy E. Howard, jurist; Mary Gwendolin Caldwell, philanthropist; John A. Creighton, philanthropist.

Mr. Cockran has been a devoted Catholic, giving his influence, voice and means to aid in upbuilding the church in America. He delivered a powerful oration at Cooper's institute, New York, in 1891, directed against the spoliation of the propaganda. On the celebration of Archbishop Corrigan's jubilee, in 1898, he gave a large donation to the seminary fund. He is a frequent contributor to the extensive charities of the Church of St. Francis Xavier.

Mr. Cockran is the youngest of those who have received the Laetare medal. The formal presentation will be made in New York by Archbishop Corrigan.

MURPHY J. FOSTER.

New Senator from Louisiana Owes His Preferment to His Anti-Lottery Sentiments.

Murphy J. Foster, of Louisiana, was doubtless elected to the United States senate because of the strong stand he took against the Louisiana lottery. He was the leader against the anti-lottery forces in 1890, when the legislature refused to grant the Louisiana lottery a renewal of its charter. The fight for the continuation of this charter was of national interest, and because of the tremendous power wielded by the lottery people was severe and prolonged. As a reward for his services in this respect Mr. Foster was nominated for governor by the anti-lottery forces and defeated Mr. McEnery, who will be Mr. Foster's colleague in the senate, and who at the time was nominated for the governorship by the regular democratic forces. Mr. Foster served two terms as governor and now succeeds Mr. Caffery in the senate. Mr. Foster two years ago promptly put down a sympathetic strike in New Orleans when even the making of bread, delivery of water and maintenance of the city gas works was interfered with. He threatened to call out the militia, and within 24 hours the strike was at an end. Mr. Foster was born in Louisiana and is a lawyer by profession.

CAVALIER AND PEON.

Both Consider Cock Fighting a Most Interesting Sport.

Down in Mexico Game Birds Are Groomed and Dieted with Particular Care—Fortunes Won and Lost on Battles Royal.

In Mexico cock fights are commonly termed los gallos, just as bull fights are called los toros; and at all the popular fiestas they are only second in favor to the latter. A good game cock often costs as much as a horse, but this is not saying much, as a fair saddle pony is frequently sold for $15, or even less; while a game cock may bring $50, and occasionally $100. The usual price paid, however, is from $12 to $25, according to weight, breed and past record of the strain as fighters. The best cocks come from the United States, and hundreds are shipped into Mexico during the year, being in constant demand during the fiestas, which are always in progress in one part or another. There are also many cocks bred there, the hens being largely Japanese. The cocks are cared for by trainers, who feed, clean and exercise them as regularly as a jockey does a running horse. Their house is in reality a stable, each cock having his own stall, with his name above it, as El Garrean (The Sparrow), Chato (Snub Nose), Tesorero (Treasurer), Moreno (Brune), Tirante (Tyrant), Gato (Cat) and so on. A champion is called "El Mauser." In these little stalls the cocks eat, drink and sleep, being fastened by a cord to a ring in the floor. Every morning they are taken out for a run, one at a time, and each has half an hour in the dirt box, to roll and dust himself.

When not fighting they are fed once a day, about sundown, when they have all the wet corn they can eat, in individual pans, set in the stalls. They are then watered, and the inner rooster being satisfied each cuddles down in his stall and goes to sleep. Their spurs have been cut for their own comfort in sleeping, and to prevent their hurting themselves.

In trimming the combs a curious astom prevails. The piece cut off is sliced into bits with a jackknife, and fed to its former owner, who, with the blood dripping from its newly-shorn crest, devours it with avidity, frequently clucking a cordial invitation to the hens to come and join him. This is surely "game." Every well-arranged stable has a medicine chest, with remedies for smallpox, diphtheria, and the various bird diseases, and the cocks are carefully attended when sick.

On the eve of a fight the warriors are fed on tortillas soaked in milk, and raw meat with sherry. Very little water is given, the idea prevailing that they bleed less if wounded. The cocks are seldom fought before they are two years old. Many never live to fight a second time, yet they enter the arena jauntily, with heads up, plumes waving, and crowing lustily. There is something admirable in the general deportment of the fighting cock, and he seldom knows when he is "licked." Some cocks go through five and six battles, their wounds being clean-cut and easily healed on this account.

Los gallos are usually held in a small plaza, surrounded by seats, like a miniature bull ring. An orchestra dispenses lively music, while a peon stands in the ring and shouts at the top of his lungs, announcing the next event, and urging the spectators to place their bets—in any amount from 25 cents to $100, or even more. Heavy players stake as high as $1,000 on a single fight.

All this means, too, that in Mexico are many men who make a life business of cock fighting. It makes a queer sight when these cock fighters transport their birds from one place to another. The birds are carried in cone-shaped baskets, several of them, one above another. The particularly odd feature of it is that only the dandy tails of the roosters show. As the fighter carries along his burden of several cocks the gaudy tails dance up and down, making a very singular sight.

Among the men who follow the cock-fighting business are some who have lost fortunes at the sport, but refuse to abandon it. It is not unusual to see women at cock fights in Mexico, and they bet their money as freely as men. At these fights an orchestra plays, and people eat, smoke, gossip and drink with more vigor than they do anywhere else on earth.

When a rooster turns tail and runs away in a fight the spectators are free to chase it and kill it. All of the cocks killed in battle or otherwise are eaten by the natives.

AN INHERITANCE IN WESTERN CANADA.

Indian Reservations and Other New Districts to Be Opened Up This Year.

In the Great Saskatchewan Valley, and the Fertile Plains of Assiniboia.

To the Editor.

Dear Sir: The past three or four years have demonstrated to a large number of Americans the value of the grain-growing and ranching lands of western Canada. Tens of thousands have taken advantage of the offer made by the Canadian government as well as of the exceedingly low prices asked for lands by the railway, colonization and other companies. The experience of those who have been settled there for some little time is of a highly gratifying character. So much so that the Canadian government, who has control of the immigration into western Canada, has decided to open up some new districts this year in the well-known Saskatchewan valley, and also in the fertile plains of Assiniboia. These districts are probably the most productive in the entire west and in close touch to largely settled communities, as well as being situated on some of the most important lines of railway. They are within easy reach of markets, schools, churches and other social advantages. In some of these districts lands may be homesteaded as well as purchased outright at very low prices. Now as to what can be done on these lands. The evidence of the settlers in the neighborhood of the lands now about to be opened for settlement (some of them being located in one of the best Indian reservations) goes to show that the very best results have followed even most indifferent methods. Cases are given where farmers having gone there with most limited means, barely enough to erect a small house and break up a little land, have in three or four years' time become prosperous, all debts paid and money in the bank. The soil in the districts mentioned, Assiniboia and Saskatchewan, is a rich black loam, 15 inches to three feet deep. As a settler says: "It appears like the accumulation of decayed vegetation and ashes for centuries (the subsoil is a stiff putty clay)." On this soil it is possible to raise from 40 to 50 bushels of wheat to the acre; oats, 75 to 100 bushels, all of which bring good prices at the local market. For mixed farming these new districts are probably among the best in western Canada. Stock fatten easily on the wild grasses. Hay is plentiful, and prices splendid. Another settler writing to a friend in Iowa says: "The climate is all that could be desired, plenty of rainfall in summer, with no hot, dry winds. On the 28th of September I saw prairie flowers in full bloom, sweet corn, potato and tomato vines that had not been touched a particle with frost, and the winters are milder than those in the state from which I came. After the holidays the winter sets in clear and cold, with plenty of snow for good sleighing; no high winds or blizzards are known. Horses live out all winter and pick their own living, while cattle live all winter in open sheds and around the hay ricks. Wheat, oats and barley are the principal grain crops. Potatoes and all other roots and vegetables do well, the yield being enormous as compared to those in the states. Wild fruits, such as strawberries, raspberries, cranberries, gooseberries and all varieties of currants yield in abundance. As a reader of your valuable paper for a number of years, I feel that I should inform you of the progress and advancement being made in Canada within the past few years and the inducements and advantages that will follow settlement in western Canada. Those who desire information can do as I did, and apply to any agent of the Canadian government, whose name, I see, appears in advertisements appearing elsewhere in the columns of your paper, and when writing ask particularly about the Saskatchewan Valley or Assiniboia Districts. Yours truly,

"OLD READER."

OBJECT TO BEER AS CLEANER.

Protest of W. C. T. U. at the Idea of Cleaning City Hall Brick.

The temperance people of Topeka, and of Kansas for that matter, are indignant. The city is just completing a fine city hall and auditorium, which is to be opened with ceremonies early in September. Preparatory to this event the city administration has decided to revamp the new brick structure a little, and for this purpose will use a lot of stale beer stored at the police station for washing the walls of the new building. This stale beer has been seized from time to time, and in accordance with law must be spilled into the street. Rather than waste this liquid it is proposed to use it in making the new brick walls shine for the dedication ceremonies.

The State Temperance union, W. C. T. U. and other temperance organizations declare that such procedure would be an outrage and rather than permit it threaten to go to the city prison and forcibly turn the stuff into the streets.

A SAFETY SPY-GLASS.

With It One Can See Over a High Wall Without Raising One's Head Above the Top.

Modern optical devices will not enable one to see through a stone wall, but they are quite equal to the task of seeing over one without making it necessary to raise the head above the top. This is quite convenient when the presence of sharpshooters on the other side makes sudden death the penalty of rashness in this regard. The Scientific American describes a new military spy-glass that seems to fulfill all the requirements of the officer who values his safety and yet wishes to look at his enemy. It says:

"The ordinary telescope and spy-glass which military officers have used for more than 100 years is gradually giving place to an instrument far more powerful and less likely to expose an observer to the long-distance fire of an enemy. The list of dead and wounded sent home from South Africa shows that the modern high-power magazine rifle has rendered the lot of the commanding officer far more hazardous than it once was. This increased danger and the great ranges at which modern battles are fought have been the chief reasons why the ordinary spy-glass has been found inadequate by the modern army officer.

"The new instrument consists of two tubes hinged together and carried by a central handle. Each tube is provided with an objective and with an eyepiece. By means of a system of total reflection prisms the image formed by the objective is so deflected that the eyepiece, mounted at right angles to the tubes, may properly present it to the eye.

"When the instrument is open, the distance between the two objectives is about 16 inches. The lenses and tubes are so arranged that a stereoscopic effect is obtained.

"In order to make use of the stereoscopic spy-glass, the eyepieces are first purposely focused. Since, in the majority of cases, both eyes of the same person are not equal, the two eyepieces are focused independently. The instruments are regulated for a 26-inch spacing of the eyes, which is the average. For persons having eyes differently spaced, there is a very simple mechanism for regulating the apparatus. A marking arrangement permits of making such regulations once for all.

THE FIELD GLASS IN USE.

"The stereoscopic spy-glass may be employed in two different positions of the telescopes, one nearly horizontal and the other nearly vertical.

"The first position increases the spacing of the eyes through an optical illusion. In this position of the telescopes remote objects situated in different planes can be seen. The second position increases (artificially likewise) the stature of the observer. In both cases, the observation may be made from a place of concealment. For the horizontal position of the telescopes, the observer merely takes shelter behind a tree and allows the ends of the instrument to project behind the sides of the tree. The observer (in illustration) can calmly make his observations while concealed behind a wall, with the two extremities of the apparatus carrying the objectives projecting above the obstacle."

INTERESTING FIGURES.

The Exact Cost of a Horse Power in Different Varieties of Motors Now in General Use.

The cost of a horse power per hour, in different sorts of motors, has been studied by M. Charvet, in special relation to agricultural machines. Some of his results are of general interest. A French laborer working eight hours in turning a crank at a wage of about 70 cents per day produces one horse power hour at a cost of 85 cents. An ox turning a horizontal bar 13 feet long (as in some grinding mills), produces the unit at a cost of 23 cents. A horse doing the same kind of work travels much faster than the ox, and the unit of work costs a little less than 20 cents. A six-horse power steam engine (working 150 days each year at ten hours per day—as is customary in farm work) produces the unit of work at a cost of about four cents. The petroleum engine is considerably more economical in operation, but its work in France costs about seven cents on account of customs duties.

The windmill produces its unit of work at two cents, but the most economical form of motor is the water-wheel. A waterwheel whose first cost is about $160 per horse power produces a unit of work at a cost of less than one cent, and turbine wheels are even more economical.

CURIOUS COLOR EFFECT.

Optical Delusions of an Entertaining Character Produced by a Spinning Disk.

Tops have been made to yield the colors of the rainbow when spinning, although they have no hue but black and white. An Englishman named Benham has produced a similar effect with a disk of cardboard. This should be entirely blackened on one side. On the other, between the center (where there is a hole for revolving it on a pin) and the edge one may inscribe any simple figure or figures in black. Otherwise this side should be white. On that part of the disk which is furthest away from the design one or more slits are cut in the cardboard. These should lie along lines radiating from the center, shoulud not be wider than the pupil of the eye and should be within a quarter segment of the circle. In performing the experiment a person puts a pin through the hole, holds the blackened side toward him, stands before a mirror and looks at the reflection of the figure as seen through the slits. It is important, says Knowledge, in describing Mr. Benham's operation, that there should be a strong light.

If there are three slits one will see three images, and when the experiment is successful the images will be colored. The colors differ with different people and with different rates of rotation, but in general the effect is red (the lowest), green and dark blue, when the disk revolves from right to left. Colors are also seen with other dispositions of the slits, and also when there are only two, or when there are more than three, though it will be found that the arrangement described gives the most brilliant effects. The more slits the slower must be the rate of revolution and vice versa. With only one slit there is, of course, only a single image, apparently stationary and uncolored. Two slits give two images, generally red and dark blue, and changing places as to their color when the direction of rotation is reversed.

ARTIFICIAL RUBIES.

Some Are Made and Put Together So Cleverly as to Deceive Experts in Precious Stones.

"If you are not a judge of precious stones don't buy rubies unless you have them examined by an expert," said a well-known jeweler the other day. "Artificial rubies are being constantly sold as genuine stones. There are any number of counterfeit rubies on the market at present. An artificial ruby is not necessarily a doublet nor a red stone of some other variety. It may be composed of genuine rubies and yet not be a real ruby in the true sense of the word. These are called vamped-up rubies.

"A vamped-up ruby can be bought ten times cheaper than a natural one. It is made by melting a number of small rubies into one. The process is a secret. When cut it would deceive the most expert lapidary if he trusted to his eye only. He must examine with a microscope in order to detect the vamped-up stone. Then only a few bubbles are visible in it. That is absolutely the only difference between the vamped-up ruby and the natural one, and yet it makes a big difference in the price.

"This made ruby is quite as beautiful in appearance as the genuine. It has the double refraction, the exquisite depth of color and the rich brilliancy of the finest real ruby. It also possesses the hardness of the natural stone. But if you have bought it for the real thing and afterward try to sell it you will find that a jeweler will only pay for it the price he would give for any other artificial stone.

"Another device of the unscrupulous dealer is to set a rose diamond or a halved brilliant on a foundation of paste. The gold setting hides the joint. The wide refraction, which is the cause of the brilliant fireworks, will be found in the stones set this way. The only way to detect the imposition is by taking the stone out of the setting. Necklaces are frequently made in this way. Even a good jeweler would not detect the fraud unless he became suspicious and submitted the setting to an expert. Many people are wearing imitation stones under the impression that they are genuine. There are so many such excellent counterfeits sold at present that those who consider themselves judges of precious stones are often taken in. Many people who buy these imitations never discover that they have been cheated."—Buffalo Enquirer.

The Oldest Known Vegetables.

Onions and cucumbers are two of the very oldest known vegetables. Like peas, the Egyptians grew them at least 30 centuries ago. Indeed, to the onion belongs probably the honor of being the first vegetable primeval man ever made trial of. Onions are not found growing wild anywhere, but a kind of leek is not uncommon in southern Siberia which is very like the Welsh national emblem.

New Definition of Nabob.

"What's a nabob?" asked little Ethel of her eight-year-old brother. "Why, anybody ought to know that," he replied. "A neigh-bob is a horse with a docked tail."

The Farming World

SMALL GREENHOUSE.

May Be Attached to One End of the Farm House or Stand Alone in Some Sheltered Place.

A small greenhouse about eight by ten feet is shown in the accompanying cut from Vick's Magazine, which thus describes it: It may be attached by one end to the dwelling house and connected by a door, or it may stand separate in some place where it will be as much as possible sheltered from prevailing winds. Wherever the spot may be selected, it should have the best of drainage—not only surface drainage away from it in every direction, but a good underground drain should be supplied, so that by no possibility would water stand in the house.

The house may be most economically built by setting down posts at the corners and at the doorways, and one on each of the sides midway between the corners. Cedar posts should be used on account of durability. If there is only one door, eight posts would be required, or ten, if two doors.

The posts should be set firmly in the ground and cut off evenly at the top at the height of four feet six inches, and be boarded on each side to the height of three feet with matched boards, and the space between, which may be six or eight inches, should be filled in with sawdust, quite dry, or tan bark in the same condition. Above the boarding there may be 18 inches of glass.

The illustration shows two swinging sashes at the side. But it is not necessary that these should be provided, especially in a cold climate, but instead of one ventilator at the peak of the roof, it may be better to have two, one near each end and on opposite sides of the roof. No rafters will be needed in a small house like this. The sash bars will be fastened at the ridgepole and to the plate. The plate should be beveled on the inside to allow the water to run off.

This house may be fitted up with a bench on each side three feet wide and a walk in the center two feet wide. There should be a wooden extension at the north end of at least eight feet, giving a workroom eight feet square, with a door at the end entering it from the outside.

The heating of a house like this will depend on the climate. At the south a coal oil stove would serve the purpose. The most desirable way for a cold climate is first to provide a walled-up pit or cellar beneath the workroom, where may stand a small heater, with pipes running from it all around the inside of the greenhouse, below the bench, near the walls, to convey hot water. The cellar will also afford space for the storage of a small amount of coal. Three lengths of two-inch pipe all around the house would probably give all the heat that would be required.

Why the Farm Garden Pays.

Farmers do not always devote their labor in the best direction. A garden may be expensive if not carefully attended to, as the weeds soon take possession. The receipts from a garden may also be less than the cost of the product, but the season, kind of crops grown and rainfall affect the results. There is one point in favor of a garden, however, which cannot be disregarded, which is that the farmer can never buy as good fruits and vegetables as he can grow. No vegetables shipped to the farm can possibly be as fresh as those taken from the garden and used immediately.

Selection of Fruit Trees.

Only experienced persons are capable of selecting varieties of fruit trees. Novices should always seek advice. The soil, climate and demand of the market are to be considered. Varieties that may be suitable for one locality may be almost worthless in another, and it is the lack of knowledge in selecting varieties that causes some failures. Selection is a very important matter, for when a tree is planted and the grower waits several years for his crop it is then too late to rectify mistakes except at a great loss.

Two Excellent Strawberries.

The old Wilson variety of strawberry was one of the best for shipping and the plant is hardy. Its strongest rival in shipping qualities is the Atlantic, a variety that never became popular on account of throwing out but few runners. The Atlantic, however, usually gave better crops the second year of picking than the first, which cannot be said of but few other kinds. It is firm, solid and can be shipped any distance, but seems to ripen irregularly.

THOUSANDS OF FAIR WOMEN HERALD PRAISES FOR PERUNA.

Catarrhal Dyspepsia and Nervous Prostration Make Invalids of More Women Than All Other Diseases Combined.

Peruna is the woman's friend everywhere. It is safe to say that no woman ever used Peruna for any catarrhal derangement but what it became indispensable in her household.

Letters from Women.

Every day we receive letters from women like the following. Women who have tried doctors and failed; women who have tried Peruna and were cured.

Miss Katie Klein, 6125 Bartmer avenue, St. Louis, Mo., writes:

"Peruna has done me more good for catarrh than the best doctors could. I had catarrh so bad, but after taking Peruna it is entirely gone, and I feel like a different person."

Miss Anna Prescott's Letter.

Miss Anna Prescott, in a letter from 216 South Seventh street, Minneapolis, Minn., writes:

"I am sincerely grateful for the relief I have found from the use of Peruna. I was completely used up last fall, my appetite had failed and I felt weak and tired all the time. My druggist advised me to try Peruna and the relief I experienced after taking one bottle was truly wonderful.

"I continued its use for five weeks, and am glad to say that my complete restoration to health was a happy surprise to myself as well as to my friends."—Anna Prescott.

A constant drain of nervous vitality depleting the whole nervous system causes the mucous membrane surfaces to suffer accordingly. This is the condition called systemic catarrh. It very nearly resembles, and there is really no practical difference, between this condition and the condition known as neurasthenia, or nervous prostration. Peruna will be found to effect an immediate and lasting cure in all cases of systemic catarrh. It acts quickly and beneficially on the diseased mucous membranes, and with healthy mucous membranes the catarrh can no longer exist.

Peruna a True Friend to Women.

Mrs. F. J. Lynch, writes the following from 324 S. Division street, Grand Rapids, Mich.:

The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, O.:

Gentlemen—"I earnestly recommend Peruna to any suffering woman, as it cures quickly. Last year I had a most persistent cough which nothing seemed to cure. Two bottles of Peruna did more for me than all the doctors seemed to do. In a couple of weeks I found myself in excellent health, and have been enjoying it ever since. Hence I look on Peruna as a true friend to women."—Mrs. F. J. Lynch.

Peruna is equally efficacious in curing catarrh of the throat as in curing systemic catarrh or catarrh of the stomach. Catarrh is essentially the same wherever located. Peruna cures catarrh.

Peruna Makes You Feel Like a New Person.

Miss Mary Coats, a popular young woman of Appleton, Wis., and president of the Appleton Young Ladies' Club, also speaks in glowing terms of Peruna. A letter recently received from her by The Peruna Medicine Company, of Columbus, Ohio, reads as follows:

"I am glad to call the attention of my friends to Peruna. When that languid, tired feeling comes over you, and your food no longer tastes good, and small annoyances irritate you, Peruna will make you feel like another person inside of a week.

"I have now used it for three seasons, and find it very valuable and efficacious."—Miss Marie Coats.

Diseased nerves are traceable directly to poor digestion, and poor digestion is directly traceable to catarrh. With the slightest catarrh of the stomach no one can have good digestion.

Very few of the many women who have catarrh of the stomach suspect what their real trouble is. They know they belch after meals, have sour stomach, a sensation of weight or heaviness, a fullness, irregular appetite, drowsiness, gnawing, empty sensations, occasional pain—they all know this; but they do not know that their trouble is catarrh of the stomach. If they did they would take Peruna.

Peruna cures catarrh wherever located. As soon as Peruna removes catarrh from the stomach the digestion becomes good, appetite regular, nerves strong, and trouble vanishes. Peruna strengthens weak nerves, not by temporarily stimulating them, but by removing the cause of weak nerves—poor digestion. This is the only cure that lasts. Remove the cause: Nature will do the rest. Peruna removes the cause.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

Address Dr. Hartman, President of The Hartman Sanitarium, Columbus, O.

UNDER THE SNOW.

Ghastly Truths Revealed on the Disappearance of Winter's White Mantle.

Deadly dangers lurk in the ground left bare by the departing snow. All Winter long there have been accumulating deadly disease germs.

These have been protected and kept alive by the covering of snow and now, with the first warm days, these death-bringing microbes are awakened by the rays of the sun, and as the ground dries they are carried to and as the ground dries they are carried to all corners of the community in the dust that is blown everywhere by the Spring winds.

The human body at this time is particularly susceptible to these germs, especially the germs of fevers. The system has been depleted by the foregoing Winter. The blood is sluggish and filled with impurities. The nerves have not recovered from the tension they have been under for the past months. The stomach, the bowels, the kidneys, the liver are all at their worst.

It is therefore, not strange that these germs of disease find fertile ground in which to thrive, flourish and develop into deadly ills.

Spring is the time of year when one should fear an attack of fever, especially when the system is depleted, one should dread any severe illness. The vitality is at a low ebb. There is less power of resistance to throw off disease, and it is on this account that fatalities are so much greater during the Spring months than at any other time of the year.

There is but one way to ward off such dangers, and that is to fortify the human body so that it will become impregnable to the germs of invading disease.

To do this take Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy. It will build you up quickly, it will reestablish your waning appetite, it will give you restful nights of sleep, it will give vim and vigor to the nerves, and it will dispel all existing poisons that have accumulated in the body besides counteracting the effects of others that may accumulate.

Following is an instance that will illustrate the wonderful power of Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy.

Sheriff Jonas T. Stevens, who is sheriff of Hyde Park, Vt., says:—"I have used Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy especially as a blood purifier. I had a very severe humor on my arms, accompanied by a very bad itching, so severe that I could not sleep nights, causing me great inconvenience by the loss of sleep by the itching. A friend advised me to take Dr. Greene's Nervura blood and nerve remedy, which I did with the most satisfactory results, for the trouble has entirely disappeared, and I can now rest comfortably nights and have none of my former misery from the burning, itching sensations."

Remember Dr. Greene's advice will be given to any one desiring the same absolutely free if they will write or call upon him at his office, 35 W. 14th St., New York City.

A Very Remarkable Remedy.

"It is with a good deal of pleasure and satisfaction that I recommend Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy," says Druggist A. W. Sawtelle, of Hartford, Conn. "A lady customer, seeing the remedy exposed for sale on my show case, said to me: 'I really believe that medicine saved my life the past summer while at the shore,' and she became so enthusiastic over its merits that I at once made up my mind to recommend it in the future. Recently a gentleman came into my store so overcome with colic pains that he sank at once to the floor. I gave him a dose of this remedy which helped him. I repeated the dose and in fifteen minutes he left my store smilingly informing me that he felt as well as ever." Sold by all dealers.

Biliousness is a condition characterterized by a disturbance of the digestive organs. The stomach is debilitated. the liver torpid, the bowels constipated. There is a loathing of food, pains in the bowels, dizziness, coated tongue and vomiting, first of the undigested or partly digested food and then of bile. Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets allay the disturbances of the stomach and create a healthy appetite. They also tone up the liver to a healthy action and regulate the bowels. Try them and you are are certain to be much pleased with the result. For sale by all druggists.

Beware of a Cough.

A cough is not a disease but a symptom. Consumption and bronchitis, which are the most dangerous and fatal diseases, have for their first indication a persistent cough, and if properly treated as soon as this cough appears are easily cured. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy has proven wonderfully successful, and gained its wide reputation and extensive sale by its success in curing the diseases which cause coughing. If it is not beneficial it will not cost you a cent. For sale by all dealers.

NOTICE TO Tax Payers!

This is to notify the tax payers of Garrett county that the annual levy for 1901 has been made and published, and to call their attention to the following abstract, Section 45, Chapter 566, Acts of 1890, relating to the discount to be allowed and the interest to be charged on all tax bills:

"All county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of the levy thereof, and on all county taxes paid on or before the first day of September a discount of 3 per cent. shall be allowed, and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. The Treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the tax bills for county purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt given for taxes so paid. But the discount shall not be allowed unless the whole amount of State and county taxes are paid when same is made.

SEVEN DEVELOPED GOLD MINES.

60 ACRES OF GOLD ORE

THE ARENA

Gold Mining and Milling Company

CRIPPLE CREEK, COLORADO.

This Property is Estimated to be now Worth More than $10,000 per Acre and will be Worth over One Hundred Thousand Dollars per Acre, with Proper Development.

CAPITAL STOCK, $1,000,000,

Divided into Shares of $1.00 Each, Full Paid and Non-Assessable.

The Arena Company offers 50,000 Shares at 50 cents each in a Property that is Worth over $600,000

For the purpose of raising money to purchase the necessary machinery to make the mines produce daily fully THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS IN GOLD, thus enriching every individual shareholder according to the shares he holds.

YOU CAN BUY ANY NUMRER OF SHARES YOU WISH,

and make more money than can be made in any other line of investment. The gold ore is in these seven developed mines. There are 3,000 feet of ore in a vein, and these veins are true mother veins, held within walls of granite, placed there by nature. The Company has already developed this property to demonstrate that it is one of the largest gold properties of the Cripple Creek District which is the greatest gold-producing camp on earth, its output last year aggregating $24,000,000, or nearly double the amount produced in the whole State of California.

At 50 cents per Share the Company is giving you a discount of 10 cents per share to start with, making 20 cents on the dollar. As already stated, this is done for the purpose of raising $25,000 to purchase improved machinery, air-compressor drills and electric plant. We have two large hoisting engines on this property, a commodious shaft-house, office buildings, boarding house for the men, stables, a powder-house, a large quantity of tools, etc. The reports on these mines, made by one of the best mining engineers in the State, succinctly describe these improvements.

NAMES OF MINES.

AZTEC, 210 feet in depth, with shaft-house, boiler and engine for hoisting, well timbered all the way down.
BONDHOLDER, 260 feet deep, hoisting engine and boiler, large iron shaft-house.
MEXICO AND MANHATTAN, both over 100 feet deep, on same vein as the Aztec mine.
CRYSTAL, JASPER AND GREAT EASTERN, on the same vein as the Bondholder, and opened in depth of 100 feet, and developments already made show over 4,000 feet of ore.

If you want to make money out of nature, become a producer of gold out of her treasure-vaults. The Arena group of mines will do it for you.

We can furnish the best of references—bank and mining engineers—and our title in the property is perfect, coming as it does through a patent from the Government. With more improved machinery, from $3,000 to $5,000 per day will be a conservative estimate of the output of these mines.

Remember that only 50,000 shares of this stock are for sale at 50 cents on the dollar. Orders for the number of shares desired, accompanied by Draft, Money Orders, Express or Cash in Registered Letters, can be sent to

The Arena Gold Mining and Milling Company,
501 Equitable Building, DENVER, COLORADO.

NOVEL AND EXCITING

Louisville Man's Scheme for Match Race Between Catfish.

Planned for the Benefit of the Thousands of Knights Templar Who Will Visit the Southern City Late in August.

"How would you like to see a catfish race?" asked a tall, gaunt stranger of Mr. J. T. Gathright, of Louisville, Ky., as he entered the latter's office in the Louisville Trust building. "I've got a pair of good uns that I've been working double, but I think I could get 'em in shape to run single an' pull you off a good, square race. Excitin'! I'll bet my shanty that ther's never been a hoss race out here at the Downs that'd give one-tenth the enjoyment."

Before the stranger proceeded any further, says the Courier-Journal, he gave his name as John Sebree, said that he was a shanty boatman, and that he had heard that Mr. Gathright, as chairman of the committee on hotels and accommodations for the Louisville conclave, had been looking around for some little attraction that might be of particular interest to the visitors who stop at the Tented city in Fountain Ferry park during the celebration next August.

"I thought I might interest you in them fish, an' I dropped in," continued Sebree before Mr. Gathright had time to tell him that he believed the Knights Templars would hardly find it convenient to devote their attention to a contest between channel cats.

"I've named 'em Billy and Teddy," the visitor went on. "They're as gentle as lambs an' easier to manage than a Jeffersonville ferryboat. Billy and Teddy are both about four years old, I reckon, and I trained 'em over a year ago to draw a boat.

"How'd I do it? Well, harnessed 'em to the skiff, of course. A catfish's well-nigh the strongest animal on earth for its size. Maybe you didn't know it. Them two can easily pull a skiff with me an' my wife an' the four young uns in it.

"Now, here's what I've got to propose: I see by the papers there's goin' to be a lot of people here this summer to attend this big time the Knights of the Templars are goin' to have. A fellow was tellin' me you wanted to get up something a little out of the ordinary to give the folks you'll have at Fountain Ferry a little divershun."

"This is quite out of the ordinary, I must say," Mr. Gathright here found opportunity to sandwich in.

"Well, that's right, an' I'm your man," went on Sebree. "Now, you go ahead an' fix your seats for the people along the bank of the river an' I'll do the rest. I'll take Billy an' Teddy an' hitch 'em to a light skiff apiece. I'll fix up the skiffs with flags an' things to make 'em look like these fancy gondales—ain't it?—the Italyuns have. Then my two boys will drive 'em in a race. You understand there won't be anything seen by the audience but them two boats speedin' along the surface of the water with maybe a little foam ahead of 'em an' the two boys a-hollerin' an' the people a-shoutin'.

"For the crowds that can't see from the shore we might arrange it to get boats down there. I think we could get Capt. Billy Devan to keep the track clear. Now, I know you're wantin' to know my price for this attraction, an' I'll add that I'll bet there won't be a bigger attraction here at this conclave. Well, sir, it'll take quite a little time to get the fish in training to work single, an' I'm frank to say I want to make a little out of the thing, so I'll agree to put you up a rattling good show for $150."

"I will be glad to take the matter under advisement," said Mr. Gathright, as he bowed his visitor to the door with politeness.

Announces Change of Policy.

"Now that the warm weather is upon us," wrote the editor of the Hickory Ridge Missourian, "we take occasion to say we don't need no more corncobs on subscription. But we do need something to pacify our temper. It's pretty ugly just now, for we have got our regular spring bile. It's on the back of the neck this time, and it's a blamed bad one. When we are in this condition nothing but real money ever does us any good, and if our best friend should walk into the office and try to get us to take garden truck or salt pork on subscription he'd get into trouble. Bring in the cash, and bring it right now, or we won't be responsible for anything that happens in this community for the next ten days."

UNUSUAL HABITATION.

Grief-Stricken Georgia Widower Lives in a House Built Over the Grave of His Wife.

Col. Elijah de Board, of Gilmer county, Ga., is probably the only man in the United States whose home is over a grave. This unusual habitation is not due to eccentricity or for the purpose of attracting notoriety, but is simply a case of loyal devotion shown in a visible way to the memory of his wife.

The recent loss of his partner in life, says the New York Herald, affected him deeply, since which time he has become a recluse. His devotion has been carried to an extreme,

HOUSE OVER A TOMB.
(Inhabited by a Widower Whose Love Survived Spouse's Death.)

it is thought by his neighbors, as he has given up living in his large home and has just built a house on the spot where his beloved wife rests, on the beautiful mountain side near his home. The structure is a small but substantial octagon of stone, and on the iron opening into the single room is the following inscription: "One in life, and one in death."

In the right hand corner is the grave of his wife, while a secondary space near by he has reserved for himself, where at the end he can find repose. Around the windows flowers have been planted, and the venerable patriarch spends the day in beautifying the surroundings of his strange home.

On the anniversary of her death, with the assistance of a local pastor, the funeral ceremony is repeated. The colonel has turned a deaf ear to numerous entreaties of his friends to give up his solitary abode, as he has expressed the desire to spend the remainder of his days in this tomblike structure.

AN ANNUAL LYNCHING.

Spanish and Portuguese Sailors Execute a Dummy of Judas Iscariot on Good Friday.

Judas Iscariot was lynched in several old world places during the recent Passion tide season. This is in accordance with a curious and remarkable custom that prevails in Spain and Portugal, and which is observed in London and other British ports by the sailors of those nationalities whose ships happen to be in those waters at the time.

A dummy figure is made of a man supposed to represent the betrayer of Christ. This effigy, which is stuffed with straw, is allowed to remain practically unheeded on the deck until after the sailors have attended morning service; but no sooner are the devotions closed than the peace of Judas is at an end.

With one accord the seamen rush to where the unconscious dummy lies, the first to reach it seizing it roughly and stamping and spitting upon it until it is wrenched from his grasp by one of his fellows, who subjects it to similar treatment, and so on all around. From one member of the crew to another the effigy is tossed and pitched about, execrations being leveled at its head.

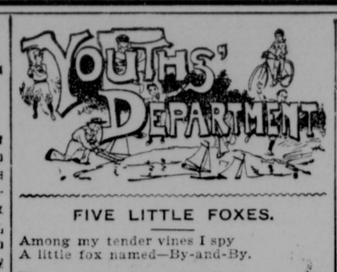
Presently somebody produces a rope, which is instantly seized upon and tied round the neck of the dummy Judas. For hours after that the effigy is dragged up and down the deck, being constantly reviled, spurned and spat upon.

Finally, when everybody has had enough of it, and is thoroughly winded, the dummy is hoisted to the masthead, being left there until the following morning.

Whenever a sailor comes on deck throughout the whole of Good Friday he looks up towards the swaying effigy, spits at it and utters a curse.

Small Parishes in Wales.

One of the smallest parishes in Wales is the historic parish of Sher in the Bridgend union. It has only a population of eight or nine souls. Nash and Stembridge, two other parishes, only number 14 inhabitants between them.



FIVE LITTLE FOXES.

Among my tender vines I spy
A little fox named—By-and-By.

Then set upon him quick, I say,
The swift young hunter Right away.

Around each tender vine I plant,
I find the little fox—I can't.

Then, fast as ever hunter ran,
Chase him with bold and brave—I can.

No use in trying—lags and whines
This fox among my tender vines.

Then drive him low, and drive him high,
With this good hunter, named—I'll try.

Among the vines in my small lot
Creeps in the young fox—I forgot.

Then hunt him out and to his pen
With—I will-not-forget-again.

A little fox is hidden there
Among my vines, named—I don't care.

Then let I'm sorry—hunter true—
Chase him afar from vines and you.

FOUND ONLY IN MAINE.

The Coon Cat Watch Emerges from Its Home in the Forest During the Early Days of Spring.

"Coon" cats are peculiar to Maine, and this is the season of the year during which they are tempted by the warm weather to emerge from their forest homes and go to the neighboring farmhouses in search of plentiful meals.

Although the first home of the coon cat is usually some nook sheltered by underbrush, he prefers a civilized life. His method of establishing himself as a member of some well-to-do family is to amble gently along toward an open kitchen door, and with ingratiating purrs, accompanied by soft rubs against the feet of anyone there, indicate his friendly feelings toward the household.

That was the way Teddy settled himself in life. He is a typical coon cat, with long, waving coat of glossy jet black fur and a tail like a large black pompon. His face is a little wider than that of an ordinary cat, giving him the appearance of having fat cheeks, and his soft, cushioned paws are like velvet.

When we entered the kitchen of the Sanden home with a diffident air, and looked around with the bright golden eyes that are universally admired, Teddy was received with open arms and named at once.

The household knew immediately what he was and the object of his visit. "It's a coon cat come to stay," and stay he did. Teddy is much more tame and affectionate than the average cat, for he never gets angry.

In the matter of meals he is like other coon cats, and hugely enjoys a meal of vegetables, while a dish of sweets is hailed with joy. He likes to take an ear of fresh corn in his paws and gnaw off the kernels, while another pleasant occupation is to get the meat out of pumpkin seeds. Small birds he also considers dainty and worth the trouble of catching. This trait of his, "birding" his owners call it, is not viewed with approval by the family, but various scoldings and withholdings of regular meals have as yet failed to impress Teddy with his wickedness. Sometimes, too, he will return to his native woods for a few days, occasioning grief and lamentations by his absence. These visits occur about once a year, during the summer, and last about three days. Teddy has no excuse to offer on his return, but wears a reticent air and the satisfied look which suggests a good meal of small birds.

He likes pumpkin pie, and, despite his usual honesty, cannot be trusted alone in the room with one when it is cooling. A new servant, who had not yet become accustomed to Teddy's ways, made a huge, old-fashioned deep-dish pumpkin pie the other day, and put it on the dining-room table to cool. Teddy was seated on the mantel, so he saw the pumpkin pie, which seemed to be put there for him. When the family entered the room an hour later he had eaten the center out of the pie in the form of a perfect saucer, and, seated in the middle of the pie, was eating around himself with the leisurely air of a person who has dined well and can afford to be indifferent.

A jar of maple sirup or molasses also presents temptation that cannot be resisted, and if he happens to fall in when engaged in lapping it up Teddy simply resigns himself to receiving a soapy bath later as punishment.

He is just a type of all the coon cats with their beautiful grace and funny ways. Some of the cats are snow-white and others gray and white, but they all have the silky coat of long fur and plumy tails. The fondness for vegetable foods is also general among them, and so is the hankering after sweets. A coon cat is so pretty and engaging in its ways that it is always sure of a welcome in any Maine household.—N. Y. Tribune.

FAITHFUL OLD HORSE.

How Bony Helps His Master to Dispose of His Garden Truck Quickly and Profitably.

An American has made a great deal of money by training two beautiful white horses to dive into the water from a great height. He travels and exhibits his horses, and people gladly pay to see them. This is all very wonderful, but on Puget sound there is a plain, homely, bony, brown horse who never was trained to do anything in his life, but who does just as wonderful things and thinks nothing of it.

Bony's owner is a rancher, who lives on one of the wooded islands where the boats stop once a week for vegetables to be taken to the city. The rancher can make more money by taking his own produce to the city and peddling it on the streets than by shipping it to the wholesale men, so he keeps his wagon in the city and when the boats stop at his island loads on Bony and his vegetables. When the boat reaches the city dock Bony shows of what he is made. While the gangplank is all right for the passengers and the vegetables, Bony cannot go ashore that way. He is led to the edge of the boat, his master speaks to him and into the deep cold water of Puget sound he plunges. He is entirely out of sight for so long you begin to wonder if he will ever come up; but presently his head appears above the water and he swims in a straight line for the shore. There he stands till his master comes up to him, hitches him to the cart, packs in his load and drives off to make his deliveries.—Chicago Record-Herald.

INSIDE OF A WATCH.

It Is Composed of Nearly 100 Pieces, Put Together with Marvelous Care and Precision.

If you own a watch, open it and look at the little wheels, springs and screws, each an indispensable part of the whole wonderful machine. The busy little balance wheel alone is the result of hundreds of years of study and experiment. The watch I have before me is composed of 98 pieces, and its manufacture embraces more than 2,000 distinct and separate operations. Some of the smallest screws are so minute that the unaided eye cannot distinguish them from the steel filings or specks of dirt. Under a powerful magnifying glass a perfect screw is revealed. The slit in the head is 2-1000 of an inch wide. It takes 308,000 of these screws to weigh a pound, and a pound is worth $1,585. The hairspring is a strip of the finest steel about 9½ inches long, 1-100 part of an inch wide and 27-10000 of an inch thick. It is coiled up in spiral form and finely tempered. The process of tempering was long held a secret by the few possessing it, and even now is not generally known. Their manufacture requires great skill and care. The strip is gaged to 20-1000 of an inch, but no measuring instrument has yet been devised capable of fine enough gaging to determine beforehand by the size of the strip what the strength of the finished steel will be. A 20-10000 part of an inch in the thickness of the strip makes a difference in the running of a watch of about six minutes per hour. The value of these springs when finished and placed in watches is enormous in proportion to the material from which they are made. A comparison will give a good idea. A ton of gold is worth $627,915. A ton of steel made up into hairsprings when in watches is worth $7,882,200—more than 12½ times the value of pure gold. Hairspring wire weighs 1-20 of a grain to the inch. One mile of wire weights less than half a pound. The balance gives five vibrations to every second, 300 every minute, 18,000 every hour, 432,000 every day and 157,680,000 every year. At each vibration it rotates about 1¼ times, which makes 197,100,000 revolutions every year. In order that we may better understand the stupendous amount of labor performed by these tiny works let us make a few comparisons. Take, for illustration, a locomotive with six driving wheels. Let its wheels be run till they shall have given the same number of revolutions that a watch gives in one year, and they will have covered a distance equal to 28 complete circuits of the earth. All this a watch does without other attention than winding once every 24 hours.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

Cats in Neapolitan Churches.

In Naples there exists a race of cats which live in the churches. They are kept and fed by the authorities on purpose to catch the mice which infest all old buildings there. The animals may often be seen walking about among the congregation or sitting gravely before the altar during time of mass.

Applying a Text to Grandpa.

"Would you like me to give you a quarter, grandpa?" asked five-year-old Johnny. "Certainly," replied the old gentleman. "Very well," said the little diplomat, "then you should do unto others as you would that others should do unto you."

NEW AERIAL MOTOR.

European Aeronauts Claim That It Is Constructed on the Most Plausible Theory.

European aeronauts are just now talking a great deal of a very novel airship, which has been constructed by MM. Filippi, of Bizerta, and Macler, of Tunis, and are wondering whether it will really do all that they claim for it. They maintain boldly that their airship can be uplifted and made to move in any desired direction by means of atmospheric pressure.

"Our balloon," they say, "will be entirely at our command after the atmosphere has been artificially rarefied in front of it."

Their invention in no way resembles an ordinary balloon. It is shaped like a skiff, on which are several masts. On the summit of each mast is a cone, and this is surmounted by a small wing. A machine causes the cone to turn, and their rotation, it is said, is bound to create an impulse under the airship which will necessarily send it upward. In the front and rear of the skiff there are also revolving cones, which are designed to rarefy the air and thus prevent the balloon from stopping.

That this is a most plausible theory all scientists admit, but some of them insist that no balloon constructed on this principle will ever be able to travel through the air. Thus M. Henri de Parville says: "MM. Filippi and Macler are merely wasting their time. A dozen years ago M. Puskas, a well-known scientist, came and told me that he had at last invented a perfect balloon. I asked him what the principle was and he said atmospheric pressure. I pointed out many objections to it, but he went ahead, and in a short time he had built a 90-foot balloon, at a cost of 350,000 francs.

"He was then more enthusiastic than ever, but somehow he never succeeded in getting his balloon off the ground, and he died in Vienna without accomplishing his object. Now, this Puskas balloon was designed on exactly the same principles as the one constructed by Messrs. Filippi and Macler."

"The idea is certainly ingenious," says M. A. de Cunha, "but at the same time this would be a very dangerous airship, for the reason that a machine is used for the purpose of keeping it in the air and in motion, and if this machine were to break a calamity would certainly occur."

Others, on the contrary, are confident that the new airship will travel speedily and safely through the air, and both they and those who disagree with them are waiting anxiously for the first test of the airship, which will be made near Paris at an early date.

A PLANT THAT COUGHS.

The Eutada, a Tropical Vine, Sneezes Violently When Brought in Contact with Dust.

It is now well known that the sharp and broad distinction formerly made between animals and plants does not conform to the facts. The cells of plants, like those of animals, are differentiated in functions and are grouped to form special organs of nutrition, respiration, excretion—even for the perception of light. The sensitive plant (Mimosa) has a well-developed sense of touch.

A certain tissue in the leaves of plants performs the functions of a liver.

The respiration of plants is especially interesting. On the under side of leaves and on green stems are millions of microscopic mouths, each of which is opened and closed by two movable lips. These openings are the terminations of passages which are filled with water, vapor, air and other gases, produced by the chemical changes which accompany growth.

The vine called the coughing bean (Eutada tussiens) is a native of moist, tropical regions.

By accidental transportation of its seeds it has gradually spread to much less congenial spots, especially railroad embankments, where it endures drought very well, though its growth is stunted. But there is one thing which it cannot stand, and that is dust. When the breathing pores become choked by dust the gases accumulate within the leaf for a time and then are forcibly expelled in an audible paroxysm of coughing and sneezing, which makes the leaf tremble violently. At the same time the whole plant becomes red in the face, so to speak, through the sinking in of the green chlorophyll grains and the appearance of particles of red coloring matter on the surface.

The Eutada is sometimes cultivated as a house plant. Sweeping the room is very apt to set the poor plant a-coughing, to the intense astonishment of persons who are unfamiliar with its peculiarities.

DISTEMPER IN DOGS.

Coccus of the Disease Has Recently Been Isolated and Vaccination Is Now Quite au Fait.

Vaccination of dogs as a preventive of distemper has just been announced in England by Dr. Copeman. He recently isolated the coccus of distemper and through experiments with the cultivated germs has prepared a vaccine that renders animals immune from the contagion.

Dr. Copeman discovered that the laboratory cocci, injected into a dog, was universally fatal. But when treated with diluted carbolic acid at a temperature of 60 degrees centigrade the vaccine so prepared made animals immune from distemper in any contact.

This discovery has been recognized as of great value in England. At the same time Dr. Copeman has not had a chance to prove how long this immunity may last, and dog breeders all over the world are to be brought to try the vaccine with an eye to its lasting effect.

This discovery is interesting from a pathological point of view from the fact that long ago the disease was classed as a variola and an inoculation of cowpox was proved to be ineffectual against it.

From the time of Aristotle canine distemper has been recognized. In 1028 it almost wiped out the dogs of Bohemia. France suffered from it in 1740, and before the century ended nearly every part of Europe had felt the scourge. It exists in nearly every part of Europe to-day.

Time and again in recent years unsuccessful efforts have been made to find the germ of the distemper. Now that it is found it does not show marked variations from several other well-known micrococci.

FREEZING BACTERIA.

Fresh Experiments Prove That Long Continued Cold Will Destroy Even the Liveliest of Them.

Within the last year or two some interesting experiments have been conducted in England, with the purpose of ascertaining the effect of extreme cold on the vitality of various kinds of bacteria. The tests were made with liquid air and liquid hydrogen, by means of which temperatures were obtained 300 to 400 degrees below zero. In the majority of instances the microbes withstood this amazing chill and on thawing out exhibited signs of life.

In these experiments, however, the cold was applied for only a very short time, a few minutes or a few hours. A different class of tests has just been reported to a bacteriological congress by Dr. W. H. Park, of the New York health board. He employed only typhoid bacilli, but in order to make the investigation more thorough he took specimens which he had cultivated from 20 different cases of disease. Thus any inequality in their hardiness was guarded against. The particular feature of this scheme was not the severity of the cold, but its duration. Having prepared a lot of tubes containing his culture, Dr. Park reduced them all to a temperature of 23 degrees Fahrenheit, only a little below freezing, and kept them there. Then at intervals he would remove a tube and examine the bacilli.

At the end of 3½ days he found 42 per cent. of the microbes in the first tube alive. In a week all but 14 per cent. were dead in another. In two weeks only 7½ per cent. survived, in three, 0.4; in five, 0.11, and in seven, 0.9. The percentage diminished as time went on, until in 22 weeks, or fully five months, all of the bacilli were dead. The tube opened after 18 weeks was the last to show any life left. It thus appears that a long winter will usually kill typhoid bacilli, even if it is not a severe one.

Fast Trolley Car Service.

In Philadelphia a fast trolley car is being tested. It takes newspapers in the early morning to Chestnut Hill, 14¾ miles away. It runs at a rate of 35 miles an hour, including a stop at least every three-quarters of a mile. Occasionally it has run a mile in a minute and an eighth and it has made the entire distance in 25 minutes, including stops, which is the same time as the express trains make for the same distance. It maintains its schedule time regularly, but on one occasion it was late ten minutes, owing to the wreck of a hay wagon which was on the road.

Curious Test for Deafness.

A novel and curious test for deafness or approaching deafness has just been described by a Paris specialist. If the handle of a vibrating tuning fork be applied to the knee or other bony portion of the human frame the sound cannot be heard by the person who possesses an unimpaired ear, but if the ear be attacked by disease, then the note can be heard distinctly.

Newspaper Frauds.

"Non-partisan" papers, edited by partisans, are the most patent humbugs of the age. In commenting upon public matters they start out non-partisan, but wind up partisan. They are simply frauds. A partisan paper is the more to be admired. It sacrafices patronage for principle. It is more honest, for it does not play for both sides, and does not pretend to be anything than partisan. There is nothing antagonistic to honesty in being partisan, and there is every inducement to dishonesty in being non-partisan or independent. The most despicable object is a partisan who pretends to conduct a non-partisan or independent paper, and then by his acts endorses every principle and policy which his party espouses.—Westminster (Md.) TEXAS politicians have ceased their execrations against trusts since the obleaginous resources of the Lone Star State have been brought to the surface.

MR. BRYAN has announced that if John J. Lentz will become a candidate for United States Senator that he will deliver a few addresses from the tail end of a limited express. Truly Ohio Republicans are fortunate.

PEERING into the political future Mr. Gorman would fain perceive a vacancy in the United States Senate which he alone can fill. Happily the man with the far away look often cannot see beyond his nose.

WILLIAM J. BRYAN has invaded Missouri with some new lantern slides to revive interest in free silver. The Democratic politicians who broke into ecstatic rapture and drew rounds of applause at the mere mention of "our matchless leader, William Jennings Bryan," now conceal themselves in the shrubbery at his approach. Verily how fleeting is fame.

MR. GORMAN may possess remarkable power in the way of handling a legislature, but when it comes to voting, the people have their inning, as was demonstrated in Baltimore's first election under the new law. The marked success achieved by the Republicans was a rebuke to the ex-Senator and Boss Rasin. The peoples' memory is evidently much longer than the bosses imagined.—Elkton Appeal.

MR. JAMES J. HILL, president of the Northern Pacific Company, justly seeks to exonerate himself in public opinion of any part in the late Wall street catastrophe. He says he never bought a railroad share for speculation, but that he is in the legitimate business of railroad construction and extension. So far from having any sympathy with Wall street operations he suggests that the law should intervene to suppress the gambling methods by which substantial business interests are at the mercy of the most unscrupulous. Most of the men who create these scandals in the stock market, he says, are engaged in dealing in what they have not got and cannot deliver.

THE news that Mr. Gorman is to take personal charge of the Democratic campaign in Maryland this year seems to meet with general approval in Republican circles. It is hard for a man of Mr. Gorman's aspirations to come to the conclusion that his day as a political boss has ended. Until he was driven from power by the people in 1895 his will was the will of the Democratic party, and his influence was felt in every section and corner of the State. Revolutions do not go backwards. Every reason that existed for Mr. Gorman's overthrow in 1895 still stand good for his continued retirement. He seems to imagine, however, that the past is dead and forgotten, and that in order to be restored to power he has only to say the word. Unlike Senator Quay, of Pennsylvania, who said in a speech a few days ago that "his political race is run," and that "his connection with the serious labors and responsibilities of active political life has ceased, Mr. Gorman yearns for the restoration of the old order of things when he was big chief." He is not in the mood of the contemplative philosopher in statesmanship who is anxious to withdraw from the scenes of his long labors for the civic welfare and henceforth became a sage in the tranquility of retirement. But he will soon realize that the judgment of the people will not be reversed.

"Our Comrades Gone Before."

Decoration Day, May 30, will this year be observed throughout the country quite as generally as in former seasons. A neighboring Department Commander, who deprecates the disposition too often shown to make the day one of recreation, in all sorts of ways, rather than occasion to suitably remember the brave dead by tokens of love and effection, says: "Thirty-three years ago the beautiful ceremoney of strewing fragrant flowers and holding solemn service over the graves of our departed comrades was first ordered by that peerless general, John A. Logan, then commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic. The rules and regulations of our order now require commemorative service on Memorial day, and, if impressed, as we should be, by veneration for the heroism displayed by those who have fallen, their unselfish devotion to country, their zeal, fortitude and courage, and their great sacrifices that the union of these states might be perpetuated, we shall make this annual pilgrimage a labor of love and affection, and not an opportunity for games and hilarity."

New Office for David E. Dick.

BALTIMORE, May 22.—State Senator David E. Dick, of Allegany county, has been appointed deputy naval officer at the port of Baltimore to succeed John W. Cable, of Washington county, who was recently made naval officer to succeed Norman B. Scott resigned. Mr. Dick resigned his position in the goverment land office and the understanding is that he is to hold the position of deputy naval officer for one year at which time Mr. Cable's term expires, he having been appointed to fill Scott's unexpired term only. Next year a new naval officer will be appointed and Cable will resume his former position as deputy.

Francis Goodwin, a young Baltimore lawyer, who formerly lived at Barton, Md., has been appointed to the place in the land officer vacated by Mr. Dick.

CORKSCREW PHILOSOPHY.

CENSUS RETURNS MEAGRE.

Not Sufficient Data on Which to Base Estimate of State's Population.

Assistant Census Superintendent Ogden said today that the Census Bureau had to date received absolutely no data upon which any comparison could be made with the Federal Census or the result gauged in the State, Baltimore city or any county.

A county newspaper, he said, had stated that one precinct in Garrett county had shown an increase of 61 over the Federal Census, but the other precincts might show a loss. Of course, if that ratio of increase should be kept up, the county would gain an additional representative in the House of Delegates.

Mr. Ogden reiterated what he had before said, that no figures would be given out until the result of the census was laid before Governor Smith. —Tuesday's Baltimore News.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Among the arrivals the past week were Joseph Forward and family, Hotel Columbia; H. G. Sharp and wife, of New Philadelphia, O.; Mrs. S. L. Allen, Baltimore; Mrs. Daniel Smith, Washington, D. C.; Miss Carrie Rudisill, Altoona, Pa.

Painters and paper hangers at work making the Mountain Lake Hotel inviting and cheerful. New brussel carpets are to be laid. The hotel is being put on a first-class basis in every respect and will be run as A No. 1.

Mrs. Whiting, of Sewickley, Pa., has rented Dr. Baldwin's cottage on "The Drive."

Mrs. Yost is a guest of her sister, Mrs. T. J. Cornwall.

Major J. M. Burns spent last Saturday in the Park arranging for the coming of his family to their summer home.

John Arnold, of Oakland, is assisting his brother Frank in plastering "Woodlawn" cottage.

L. A. Rudisill preached in the Methodist church, Newburg, W. Va., Sunday last.

BLOOMINGTON.

Piedmont Independent.

Mrs. Cal Simpson returned home Saturday from a visit to her mother, Mrs. Henry Cross, of Tunnelton.

Garland Howard, Elzie Fazenbaker, Grant and Benton Harshbarger are working in the mines at Tunnelton.

James Hartly went to Birmingham, Ala., last week and secured work in the mines near that city. He reports times good in that locality and wages fair.

Miss Lotta Kemp is entertaining this week Mrs. Smith, of West Union, wife of Editor S. P. Smith, of the West Union Democrat.

Mrs. Annie Lichliter, of Elkins, wife of Capt. Dan Lichliter, of the W. Va. C. and P. R. R., accompanied by her daughter, Miss Benette, is visiting the Harshbarger family.

Miss Fannie Bartlett, postmistress, is off duty on account of ill health. She is recuperating with relatives in Cumberland.

Bert Miller returned last week from Alabama and is staying with his brother, Henry Miller. He expects to remain in this region during the summer, returning South in the fall.

Jerry Shillenburg and family have taken up their residence at Elk Garden.

The sale of the personal effects of the late Henry Warnick took place Thursday afternoon. The geniel Robert Morehead cried the sale and he fell into the place like an old veteran in the business.

Mr. and Mrs. William Hamilton and Mr. Charles Kight, of Hampshire Hill, were in town last Thursday.

Allegany county has commenced the erection of a bridge over the ravine made by the landslide on the county road at the Buxton mine.

Ephraim Poland, of Bachelorville, returned home from Tunnelton on Wednesday, accompanied by his aged father. The latter will make his home with his son in the future.

Our post-office has been equipped with handsome new call boxes.

Dr. Kemp returned last week from the Maryland General Hospital, Baltimore, where he accompanied Arlie Warnick, son of Gilbert Warnick, for a surgical operation. Young Warnick is eleven years old and has been suffering since last August with a disease of the bones of the right lower limb and it was in view of saving his leg that he was taken to the hospital. The surgeons operated on the patient last Thursday and hope ultimately to send him home with a good sound leg.

To Arrest Many Husbands.

West Virginia's new law punishing husbands and fathers for non-support of their families took effect Monday. Hundreds of arrests previously planned by the humane societies of the various counties were ordered. Since last February complaints of desertions and non-support have been quietly looked over and the cases worked up. All that was required today was the issuance of warrants for the arrest of the recreant husbands and fathers. It is estimated that every county in West Virginia will have a score or more of arrests each.

Local Paper Deserves Support.

The effort of any newspaper to build up a town is practically nullified unless it is backed up by the business men of the town. A stranger turns from the news columns of a paper to its advertising columns, and if he fails to find there the business cards of the merchants and professional firms he comes to the conclusion that the editor is not appreciated, in which case it is a good place to keep clear from. No town ever grew without the active assistance of its papers. Nor can papers grow and build up their localities without the assistance of the town Business men should realize this and remember that in lending support to their local paper they are not only building up their own business, but are helping to support that which is steadily working for the growth of the whole town.—Press and Printer.

A Ball Write-Up.

A cow-boy reporter on a wild western paper was sent to a swell ball to write it up and here is an extract from his report of the costumes of the ladies present:

"Miss Mary Monroe, red frock, white sack, and hair bunched; Miss Emma Latrobe, yellow dress and high heeled slippers; Miss Marion Willoughby, some kind of thin stuff, white and tied up with blue tape and hair frizzled; Miss Jennie Murchison, black clothes and a feather in her hair; Miss Ella Wexford, red hair and grey suit, flat in front and stuck out behind; Miss Pauline Taelev, bigger'n a tub, and dressed to the top branch—she had a velvet outfit a mile long, and sixteen rows of buttons on her gloves—her hair was a dead yellow, tied up like a bun, and had a lot of vegetables in it; Miss Florence Ross, green dress flipped with velvet and hoisted up at the side with a white checkrein, Miss Vinne Hammerstey, white network with red streak, walked with a limp, and hair frescoed."

Whitewash That Lasts.

As this is the time of year to fix up and make presentable all outbuildings, we give the Government recipe for making whitewash—an article which should be more generally used than it is:

Take half a bushel of unslacked lime, slake it with boiling water, cover during the process to keep in steam, strain the liquid through a fine sieve or strainer and add to it a peck of salt, previously dissolved in warm water, three pounds of ground rice to a thin paste and stirred in while hot, half a pound of Spanish whiting and one pound of clean glue, previously dissolved by soaking in cold water, and then hanging over a slow fire in a small pot hung in a larger one filled with water. Add five gallons of hot water to the mixture, stir well, and let stand a few days, covered from dirt. It should be applied hot, for which purpose it can be kept in a kettle or portable furnace.

The east end of the President's house at Washington is embellished by this brilliant whitewash, says the Practical Farmer, which gives the above recipe. It is used by the government to whitewash light-houses. A pint of this wash mixture, if properly applied, will cover one square yard, and will be almost as serviceable as paint for wood, brick or stone, and is much cheaper than paint. Coloring matter may be added as desired.

In Cumberland the city election Monday resulted in the selection of three councilmen each by the Republicans and Democrats, a gain of one for the latter, but with holdovers the Republicans will have a majority of four in the council. The Republicans on the total vote carried the city by 36 majority. The honors were even in the election of councilmen. The library project was defeated by the decisive majority of 1073.

James H. Wilson, Esq., of Blaine, was here Tuesday in company with Mr. George W. Moon, of the same section. On Friday, Mr. Wilson said, a terrific rain storm visited his community which washed out the roads and the growing crops, besides carrying a small bridge which spanned a narrow stream. Whole fields of oats and other grains, besides gardens, were utterly ruined.

It is a remarkable fact that no town grows or prospers without the aid of live aggressive newspapers. A stranger nearly always looks at the papers of a town and if he does not find the cards of the business and professional men he concludes that it is a good place to keep clear from so he goes elsewhere. Nor can the papers grow without the assistance of the town. Everything spent with the newspaper helps the town that much.

We have one or two inquiries as to the soy bean. This bean is a native of Japan, where it is very extensively grown as a nitrogenous food for the people, where it helps to balance their daily ration of rice. It grows with a branching, treelike stalk to a height of two or three feet and bears a small pod containing a yellow waxy bean, which will yield from 20 to 30 bushels per acre. It takes about 100 days to mature the bean from the time of planting. It is richer in protein, both foliage and the bean, than any other crop which can be grown in the temperate zone, and as it possesses all the soil fertilizing qualities of clover it is a plant which well deserves the attention of all farmers and stockmen. Cut green and cured as hay, it will furnish to any farm the source of protein which will supplement bran and oilmeal and enable a man to produce on his own farm a completely balanced ration for all his stock.

The three little children of Edward P. Porterfield, a resident near Job, Randolph county, W. Va., were killed by a black bear in the mountains twelve miles southeast of Job. The bodies were found Tuesday evening on the mountain side where the children apparently lost themselves before falling into the clutches of the bear.

We publish elsewhere as an advertisement the prospectus of the Oakland Hotel which will be under the management of Col. Chas. E. Headley, mine host of the Grafton Hotel, Grafton, W. Va. Col. Headley has improved the service at the Grafton Hotel wonderfully since he has been in charge and makes many promises for the Oakland which we have no doubt he will keep.

"Limburger cheese," says an exchange, "if laid in a cupboard or refrigerator will drive away ants." We don't doubt it. Limburger cheese will do even more. It will drive hogs out of a tanyard, it will drive a spike through a a brick wall and a balky mule through a wire fence. A small piece of cheese properly warmed up will dismiss a congregation quicker than a fire. Yes sir, there is no doubt about it, limburger cheese will drive away your "ants," your uncles, your cousins, as well as your mother-in-law.

Dr. and Mrs. Edwin W. Greene, of Washington, D. C., stopped in Oakland Monday night on their way to Friendsville, this county, where Dr. Green will locate for the practice of dentistry. He is a graduate of the Columbian University Dental College and has had several years' experience with the leading dentists of Boston, Baltimore and Washington. He will visit nearby points to Friendsville at stated intervals. A well equipped office for bridge and crown work by the latest improved methods will be opened by him. Especial attention will be paid to the extraction of teeth without pain. Both Dr. and Mrs. Greene are pleasant and agreeable conversationalists and we have no doubt they will be heartily welcomed by the citizens of Friendsville and community.

Death of Judge McRobie.

Judge Thomas R. McRobie, of the Orphans' Court, died at his home near Swanton yesterday afternoon at 5.30 o'clock after an illness of a few days of inflammation of the kidneys. He was aged about 60 years and was an old soldier, being a member of the Third Maryland Regiment. His funeral will take place to-morrow at Bittinger.

The wet weather during the past few days has put a stop to the work of Contractor Kennedy and the corporation employees in making the fills and paving the balance of Second street. The roadway has been completed, but the sidewalks remain to be finished. As the boardwalks have been torn up and earth filled in in the low places pedestrians find little comfort in traveling along the thoroughfore. Housekeepers and business men find it a hard matter to keep their places clean and it is only by the hardest work and keeping constantly at it that stores and offices are at all presentible.

Saturday last ground was broken and the work of erecting the foundation for the addition to THE REPUBLICAN building was begun. The addition will be 35x35 feet, two stories high, brick veneer and finished in conformity with the main building. The lower floor of the new addition will be utilized for a press room and the upper floor used as a composing room. The present quarters used jointly as a press and composing room will be partitioned off into suites of office rooms, of which there will be eight. The entire building will be heated with steam, sanitary plumbing will be installed and when completed the office rooms will be rented to those desiring them. Already two suites have been rented and probably three.

Off For Nome City, Alaska.

Tuesday morning the following Garrett countians left Oakland on train No. 3 for the west: Michael Nathan and Dr. Charles Beachy, of Grantsville, M. M. Ashby and William J. Shartzer, of Oakland, and George O'Brien, of near Swanton. At St. Louis the party will take another road for Seattle, Washington, where they will embark for Alaska, their destination, with the exception of Mr. Shartzer, being Nome. Mr. Shartzer will stop at Skagway, where, we are informed, he will enter the employ of the Government. The party going from Oakland will continue beach and claim mining as last year in the gold regions. The experience derived from their venture last year will be of inestimable value to them this season. We trust that the success attending them may be even better than their brightest anticipations.

Sheep Killing Dogs.

Recently dogs have been among the sheep of the farmers near Oakland with the result that a number have been killed and many crippled. Last Friday night the farms of Clark DeBerry, David T. Enlow and Andrew Shartzer were visited by dogs. At the two first named no damage was done as the household was aroused by the barking of the dogs and they were frightened off. Mr. Shartzer was not so lucky. One of his sheep was killed and six or seven crippled. The dog that did the damage has been located and will be shot.

Elected Cashier.

At a recent meeting of the Board of Directors of the First National Bank, Mr. R. E. Sliger, bookkeeper for the Lonaconing Savings Bank, was elected to fill the vacancy made by the resignation of Mr. U. G. Palmer, as cashier of the bank. Mr. Sliger will assume his duties here on June 1st. He comes to Oakland well recommended as a business man and a gentleman of the highest standing.

Wedding To-be.

Miss Charlotte Hoblitzell Zimmerman and Mr. Leonidas Polk, both of Baltimore, will be married on June 10th 1901, at St. Michael and All Angels' church, Baltimore, and will be at home after June 25th at 213 E. 21st street, Baltimore. Miss Zimmerman is well and favorably known in Oakland where she spent a number of summers for her health.

At Garthright's.

I have one hundred rolls of matting for sale from 14 to 32 cents per yard; 2 car loads best flour on earth to sell at rock bottom prices; the largest stock of drygoods and notions ever brought to Mountain Lake Park as cheap as can be where quality is considered. I want two car loads of potatoes at 40 cents per bushel, one-half cash, all the butter you can bring me and also all the eggs you have at 14 cents, one half cash. 3t

HE RODE ON A SPECIAL.

A Small Pox Patient Who Had a Car to Himself.

A rather terrifying scene was enacted on board the B. & O. accommodation train No. 72 Saturday afternoon in which a smallpox patient figured with thrilling prominence, his presence inspiring the passengers, with a degree of dread and alarm, bordering on panic. When the train stopped at Rodamer, a station not far distant from Terra Alta, a colored man climbed on board and slowly wended his way through the "smoker" in search of a seat. His face was covered with a lothsome eruption, swollen and distorted, while his hands betrayed the presence of a similar disorder. At once the attention of the passengers in the smoker was directed to the man, and one gentleman, more venturesome than his fellows, inquired what might be the nature of the colored man's disorder, all the while preserving a respectful distance.

He was informed by the sufferer that he had come in contact with a poison oak vine, and was en route to the Western Maryland Hospital, in Cumberland. The presumption gaining ground that the suspect had not returned a truthful diagnosis of his case, the passengers divining the true nature of the disease, hastily proceeded to give the fellow a wide berth by vanishing through the most convenient exit to more congenial quarters. Within less time than it takes to record the fact, the afflicted son of Ham was alone, the monarch of all he surveyed. The conductor, for once, pursued a well defined conclusion to let the company's interests take care of themselves, without interference on his part, and the gentleman with the Mt. Vesuvius complexion enjoyed a privilege he had never had before, that of traveling on a "special." The brakeman confined his sphere of duty to the rear end of the train.

When the train reached Cumberland the railroad authorities notified Health Officer Spear, the latter instituting an immediate investigation. A glance was sufficient to convince the physician that another smallpox patient had entered the corporate limits. Dr. Spear advised the railroad authorities to lock the car and hold the patient a prisoner therein until the car could be sent back to Rodamer.

However it was decided to take the patient to the county pest house at Riverside, whither he was removed in his "private car."

New Pests.

Judging from the apparently new types of insect pests which year by year turn in to annoy the horticulturist, farmer and gardener, it would seem as though the work of creation was not completed when the garden of Eden was turned over to Adam and that the development of new species of insect pests were going on all the time. Each plant, tree or flower, when brought into general cultivation, sooner or later develops some breed of bug, bacteria, beetle, aphis worm or blight to either paralyze its growth or destroy its fruitage. The bug professor at the various colleges is usually regarded as a sort of crank and useless appendage by the unthinking public, but the fact remains that entomology has become one of the most important of modern sciences and that man's future welfare and prosperity are going to hinge largely upon his ability to fight bugs.

Kicked By a Horse.

Clever, son of Mr. Geo. L. Michael, of the Michael Settlement, was painfully hurt Wednesday morning by being kicked in the face by a horse. Dr. Z. T. Kalbaugh was summoned and the patient at last report was getting along very nicely.—Piedmont Independent.

HIGHWAYS IN CANADA.

Need for Improvement Shown by Increased Demand for Good Roads.

What a road must be to be a good road should not be misunderstood. A good road is one best answering, in a broad sense, the requirements of economic fitness. Money spent on road construction is an investment from which adequate returns are to be expected. A road the cost of which is excessively great in proportion to the use made of it, however smooth, hard, easily traveled and durable, measured by the foregoing rule, may be far from being a good road. On the other hand, a common dirt road may be a good road if it is made and maintained so as to properly meet the needs of traffic. In Canada, therefore, we do not need English, French or Roman roads, but we want Canadian roads, each mile adapted to local requirements and conditions, says A. W. Campbell in a paper read before the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers.

It is impossible to make a fixed model for a road to meet all conditions. There is a tendency on the part of very many good authorities on roadmaking to lay down hard and fast rules based on their own experience. This is a very great mistake, for in no other branch of engineering, perhaps, is there so much opportunity for the exercise of individual judgment. There are such infinite gradations in climate, in character and extent of travel to be served, the nature of the soil over which the road is to pass, the opportunities and need for drainage, the quality of metal obtainable, that there is but one way to skilfully meet these conditions.

It is to thoroughly understand what a road consists of, and the physical properties of the material which are to be employed in reaching this end.

A road consists of a strong foundation capable of supporting any load or weight which may pass over it. This foundation must have a surface covering which will resist the wear of the feet of horses and action of wheels, remaining smooth and hard; a covering which will also prevent water from passing readily through to the foundation. In the road, therefore, we have a structure consisting of a foundation, floor and roof.

That the country roads throughout Canada are in an unfortunate condition is now very generally recognized. This, a careful study will disclose, is not wholly due to the fact that the expenditure upon them is small. It is rather due, in many districts at least, to the fact that the expenditure now made is mismanaged and misapplied, owing to a lack of method and an ignorance of the principles of roadmaking on the part of those in charge of the expenditure.

In Ontario money and statute labor to a combined value of $4,000,000 are annually placed on the roads and streets throughout the province. This is obviously a very considerable amount of energy; it indicates the importance of the highway as a public work, and demands a proper system of direction. That such a proper system has been utterly wanting requires no other than the proof given by the roads themselves. Not too soon can the prevailing opinion be cleared away that any and every farmer is a competent road engineer. There is imperative need of an early introduction of business and scientific principles in the management of roads.

The principle that all citizens shall contribute to the cost of roads is already being carried into effect on this continent, and exists in all European countries. There does not need to be any reason why the farmer and rural population should pay the entire cost of roadbuilding any more than they should meet the entire cost of railway and canal construction. A system of good country roads is an expensive public work, in every way necessary for the development of the country, and so long as the farmer bears the entire burden it is manifest that the desired end, good roads, will be difficult if not impossible to reach. In any event, the attempt to do so comprises an injustice.

The towns are asking for good country roads. They are beginning to realize how important for them it is to have free and uninterrupted communication with the surrounding country districts at all seasons of the year, and would no doubt be willing to pay a fair proportion of the cost, in order that road improvement might progress more rapidly. This very interest which is being displayed is the strongest evidence as to the mutual right of townsman and farmer to pay for the construction of a country road system.

Foreign instances of progressive road legislation indicate that the provinces of Canada are very inadequately equipped with the means of building and maintaining roads in a manner suited to their importance as a public work. Until the relation of the civil engineer to road control is drawn much closer there can be little prospect of improvement. This can only be accomplished by inaugurating proper systems of control in which the importance of roads is more fully recognized by government and citizen. Undoubtedly popular feeling is approaching such an end in many parts of the Dominion. The Premier of Ontario has expressed the willingness of the government to appropriate $1,000,000, under a system of state aid, but the details of the plan under which this appropriation will be made have not been completed. The general outline is expected to be a central advisory bureau, coupled with the county system, thereby providing for the improvement of main roads under competent engineering supervision. What may be expected from other provinces in the future can only be inferred from the fact that in every one, from Nova Scotia of the east to British Columbia of the west, there are prominent and public spirited citizens active in urging measures of road reform, a movement in which the civil engineers of the Dominion should be most capable of taking a part.

The Census Enumeration.

Reliable reports from the upper end of District No. 8, this county, indicate that the census taker of that district has entirely overlooked that community. The town of Wilson and the immediate vicinity has not been visited. At that point there are from 75 to 100 persons, and within a radius of two miles there are double that number. The time for taking the census under the law expired on last Friday but the enumerators were allowed several days extra in which to complete the work in their several districts.

The Ex-President Passed Through Here Tuesday.

Ex-President Grover Cleveland, who has been west on a fishing tour, passed through here on No. 8 Tuesday having been called home on account of his daughter being ill with the diphtheria and the rest of the family under quarantine at Princeton, N. J. His daughter, who is nine years old, was stricken with the disease last Friday and is now somewhat improved. She is the second daughter and her name is Esther. The other children, Ruth, Marion and Richard, are confined in the same house with the sick child, but are being kept as far removed from her as possible, and as yet they have not developed any symptoms of the disease.

A SUSPICION.

'This ol' world is gettin' kind o' foolish, pears to me.
'Tain't the plain an' sensible ol' world it used to be;
'Tain't the world that used to jog so peacefully along;
It likes to toot the whistle now an' rattle on the gong,
An' see the people hustle, of their senses nigh bereft,
Or sittin' up o' nights because they're scart o' gettin' left.
I hones'ly kin hardly keep from laughin' when I note
How men are talkin' shirt waists, while the women want to vote!

I like to see the 'lectric lights a-gleamin' near and far.
I like to feel the motion of the dashin' trolley car.
But when it comes right down to steady practice, jes' the same,
I'd rather have the hoss that understands an' knows his name.
They claim to rival sunshine with their various patent lights,
But they haven't fooled the song birds into stayin' up o' nights;
An' I like to watch the day break, an' the tinted twilight hour;
I'm satisfied to get to bed by jes' one candle power.

This hustlin' crowd is fond of the excitement, I've no doubt;
But, for my part, I'm thoroughly content to be left out.
The great throng keeps a rushin' an' a pushin' to an' fro;
If you ask it where it's goin', why, it doesn't seem to know.
There's too many tellin' fortunes an' a showin' you the way
To step right out of poverty to millions in a day.
I never was a hand to criticise an' disagree—
But hones'ly this ol' world's getting foolish, seems to me.

The Conjur Tune

By K. H. Brown.

(Copyright, 1901, by Authors Syndicate.)

"I DON'T like to leave you here alone, daughter." The head contractor looked troubled.

Marion swept a defiant shriek from her violin. "Alone!" she returned, "with the foreman and 60 negroes working right around me, here on the levee, and only two miles from town!"

"Look, dear." Her father beckoned her into his tiny stateroom. He opened his trunk and motioned towards a heap of canvas bags and sealed envelopes.

"Why—ee! Why did you get so much of the men's pay in silver?"

"That fool Rodgers brought it over on horseback. Told him to cash it all in greenbacks, but he forgot, as usual. There's $1,600; the pay for the up-river gang, as well as this one. Think you can keep an eye on it for the hour I'm away? There's really no danger; the blacks don't know it's here."

"But they know it's always sent you on Saturday noon."

"That's a fact. But they would never try to rob the cabin in broad daylight. They're an irresponsible set, though." He glanced through the cabin window at the endless chain of blue-shirted figures creeping up and down the river bank with spade and harrow. The dull rhythm of their chant mingled with the ripple of the yellow Ohio below. The boathouse seemed to beat obedient time as it swung on the slow waves.

"You mean they might kill the foreman and me to get that money if they knew it was here? It would only give them about $30 a piece. They wouldn't murder us for that."

"Of course not. But I'd take it all with me if I could. You never know what may happen."

"Nonsense, papa. Go on to town, and don't you dare to come back without a letter for me!"

"From Manila or New York?"

"There's just one town in the world for me," hummed Marion.

"Manila, then?"

"Of course. Adios, papa!"

She kissed her hand to him as he rode away. It would be lonely here in this stifling boat, rocking on a brazen stream, with nothing to see but trees and sky, a red clay embankment and an army of half-clad negroes, toiling under the lash of the foreman's voice. Sometimes she wished that she had not indulged her whim to spend the month with her father at his work; but the Manila mails are far between, and she could not sit and look at one photograph all summer, no matter how attractive it might be.

The opposite bank lay green and cool under deep willow shade. "I'd like to row over there, if I could take the money along," she thought, as she lifted the trunk lid again and inspected the contents. "But there's such a lot—why, Peter, what do you want?"

Peter, the cook's boy, stood at her elbow. "Jim wants know what you'd laik for supper," he said, dropping his eyes before her sharp glance, but not in time to hide their covetous gleam.

"Go back and tell him I'll send word presently." She slid the door bolt as Peter shambled down the deck. "I am an awful coward, and I wish he hadn't seen this. Here!" She picked up her violin case and packed the money into it. "If they should come they'll never look there!"

Half ashamed of her fears, she went back to the main cabin and took up her violin again. Unconsciously the music drifted into a slow, tuneless accompaniment of the chant without; she played on and on, smiling dreamily to herself; but suddenly the bow fell from her hands.

The chant of the negroes without had ceased!

"Why, they're stopping work! It isn't near six!" She leaned eagerly from the window. The men had dropped their tools and were running to the skiff landing, where a crowd had already gathered. Above the mass of woolly heads she saw the foreman's white-shirted arms lifted once, twice—then the crowd swayed back, as two huge negroes thrust their way through. The foreman's body swung limply between them. They flung it into a skiff, then kicked the boat out into the current. It careened a moment, then swept away down stream.

The blood leaped in Marion's throat. She felt no conscious pity for the foreman. It was just a hideous puppet show, this mutiny. "And I'm 'It' for the next game," she thought, as she watched the men scrambling across the plank bridge to the cabin boat. She put the heavy violin case on the floor beside her, and picked up her violin.

"I'll die game," she said, between her teeth, as she began to play. An instant later the barred door crashed down, and there pressed inward a blur of powerful shoulders and pitiless black faces, hot with cruel greed. Marion staggered a little; the music thrilled on, in leaping ripples under her cold hands. The men stopped and glared at her. She read awe as well as question in those wolfish eyes. But the leader pushed to her side.

"We wants that money!" he snarled. "Pete, he tole us it's here; so give over, my lady missy!"

Marion smiled back at him without speaking. The violin shrilled into a high tremolo.

"We wants that money, I say!" he lifted a menacing fist. "We ain' goin' hurt you, but we's got to have it!"

A murmur arose from the crowd at the door. An older negro stepped to the leader's side.

"She's done 'stracted," he said, in an awed whisper. "Don' you tech her. They's no tellin' who done it. Heah dat music!"

"We'll get it anyway," said the leader, backing off sullenly. "Here, you, go to work! We's only an hour, tel the boss gets back."

The men obeyed, panting. They emptied trunks and boxes; they tore the clothing from the beds and searched the mattresses; they flung china and tinware from the cupboards, groping into every cranny. Marion played on and on, still smiling. The men rolled their eyes toward her like suspicious dogs as they shuffled about the room. The doors and windows were packed with gaping faces. The very air seemed blackened by their heavy, loathsome breath. "Hell must be something like this," thought Marion. She shifted her violin, and struck a louder measure.

Baffled and angry, the men gave over their search, and turned to her again. Not one of them dared approach her unsupported; they shambled across the cabin in a grotesque phalanx, each man struggling to thrust his neighbor to the front. They stopped a yard from her, as though repelled by a wall of glass.

"We wants that money!" The leader's voice broke in furious gutteral. "We goin' send you down the river laik we did the foreman, ef you don' give it up. An' you better be quick, my lady missy!"

Marion looked at the row of demon heads beside him. His own face was that of a vengeful ape; the sweat drenched forehead, the blood-shot eyes, the savage, froth-streaked mouth, drew closer and closer. She shook her head and swept an extra flourish.

There rose a yell of rage from the men behind. "Take the fiddle 'way from her!" shouted a voice from the door. "Mek her give up dat money! She ain't got no hoodoo!"

The leader laid a brutal hand upon her shoulder; the mob pressed closer—closer. Marion flung herself backward and drew one last frantic discord from her violin.

The mob fell back as though the note had smitten them to stone. "Lordy mercy!" shrieked an old negro. "Hit's the Conjur tune! Hit brings all the Night Doctors, ridin' on the Wite Bats! Lemme go!" He fought for the door through the mass of howling, panic-stricken men. Above their yells and imprecations rose the scream of the violin, beating their ears like the trumpet of doom. Yet higher than that rang another sound—again and yet again—the echoing crack of revolver shots, punctuating the babel of terror with merciless iteration.

"Oh, father, father!" Marion groped for his tender grasp. She could not lift her head nor open her eyes, but she felt his kisses warm upon her lips.

"You're not hurt, my darling, only frightened. The men are all gone, running for dear life, with the sheriff and a posse at their heels. But the loss of the money is nothing, so long as you are safe. To think of your holding the superstitious brutes at bay so long, with that folk-lore music! My dear, brave little girl!"

"You needn't worry about the money," she spoke between weary pauses. "It's in the violin case. But what became of the foreman?"

"We picked him up on the river, as we were coming back from town. He isn't badly hurt, but we feared that something terrible might have happened to you. So captain—I mean, the Manila Letter—went ashore, and tore up here on horseback, firing his revolver to let you know—"

"The Manila letter?"

Someone else's arms were close about her now. She tried to lift her head and look at the dear, bronzed face, but it was altogether too near to admit of a distinct view.

"Oh, Lucien!" she whispered, after a little. "That you should have come to me now, just when I needed you so! Lucien, dearest, how did it happen?"

Lucien laughed. But there were queer breaks between his words, too. "I don't know, sweetheart, unless—unless it was the doings of the Conjur Tune."

TWO WOMEN.

One Sorrowed Over Little One in Heaven, the Other Over a Drunkard Shut Out of Heaven.

"Don't talk to me of love and mercy and justice! Why was my boy taken in his purity and innocence, while scores of dissolute young men are left? Explain that, and perhaps I can believe there is equity in the laws of Heaven."

The voice was low and cultured, and a tense, passionate tone vibrated in each word, showing the utter rebellion of a human soul.

The minister rose quietly. He felt the uselessness of more words then. He extended his hand, saying, in a wonderfully gentle tone: "At least, believe how deep is my sympathy for you in your sorrow, Mrs. Bruce. Good-by."

She took the proffered hand in silence. There was not a tear in the dumb, suffering eyes.

The minister passed thoughtfully down the oaken staircase. The door to the front parlor was open. A maid was bearing in a massive wreath of flowers. Beyond her he caught a glimpse of the white casket, almost covered with costly floral offerings. Yes, it was oh, so hard. What if it had been his own son, his bright, handsome boy! The bare thought made him shudder. After all, it made a great difference as to whose son it was that lay in there, so still, among the flowers. Was it to be wondered at that Mrs. Bruce's faith, never very strong, should fail her at such a sudden, fearful test?

Through the beautiful burial service on the morrow, Mrs. Bruce's rebellion deepened. Not a tear dimmed the hardness of her eyes, not a sob broke the settled weight on her heart. Her husband and two manly sons were near her, trying to comfort by their living presence. Her eyes sought only the marble face among the flowers, and her heart repeated again and again its rebellious moanings: "God was cruel; He was not love; there could be no love in Heaven if such things were allowed."

The spring came in, with its warm sunshine, thawing out the frosts of winter. But nothing seemed to melt the ice around Mrs. Bruce's heart and life. It was for her "baby lad" that her heart yearned. He had come into her home after years of silence, in which there had been no prattle of baby tongue. Perhaps this was why the mother-heart loved him most, why they all so fondly cherished him. For six brief, happy years he had been their idol. Then, without a moment's warning, he had been snatched from them.

"Had it been his own fault, or the fault of any one of us—but a falling brick! No fault of anyone—simply chance. Why should it have fallen just at that moment? Why need my darling have been in just that particular spot? Why did it all happen?" Over and over again came the poor mother's questionings until they bred a skepticism born of fear and sorrow. There was no reason in it; there was no justice; no overruling God who had loved the world. It was all chance—chance.

There came to her room one day one whom she slightly knew; a woman who wore a mask of smiles on her proud face, and a living, eating sorrow in her heart. To-day the mask was thrown aside and the living sorrow of the one woman's life looked straight and full into the dead sorrow of the other, and, surprised and awed, Mrs. Bruce was silent. What strange power was it which made her draw back and tremble at the daring of her proud rebellion?

"Your child might have become what my son is to-day," at last said the visitor, in a quiet tone.

"O, no; never!" cried Mrs. Bruce, aroused from her apathy. "My Louis would never have been like your Henry. Look at my other sons," drawing herself up proudly and haughtily. "To say my boy might have been like yours is no comfort to me."

"Nevertheless, it is true. Listen, my friend. I saw your boy once with his fair face and golden curls. But my boy's face was fairer, his curls more wonderfully golden. When I look into his bloated face now and into the bleared eyes that are almost always bloodshot, I wonder that the face could ever have been so fair and soft and smooth, and the eyes so wondrously blue that the sky seemed reflected in them. There is no assurance for you under God's heaven that your fair boy might not have become just such a drunkard as mine, so long as the snares of Satan infest the earth to entrap unwary feet.

"He was so beautiful a child," went on the voice, but softer now. "People used to turn to look at him. I did not know I loved him better than I loved God. One day he fell ill. The doctors said he could not live. Then I was wild and raved. I could not, would not have it so. Finally I prayed, if you could call such selfish pleadings prayer. I begged God to take anything, everything else from me but spare me my boy. And my wish was granted; my boy was spared. I have him yet—a living curse—God's punishment to me.

"You point with pride to your two sons," relentlessly continued the earnest woman. "Don't do it again. I, too, have a noble son, many years older than this one, and as noble a man as any mother could wish to claim. Don't think that your older sons prove what your youngest might have been, for I tell you solemnly you do not know what he might have become. Looking back over years of shame and sorrow, over such awful anguish as only the mother of a hopeless drunkard can know, I pray you to cease your murmurings. Never again utter a word against God's justice, nor against His mercy and love. Rather, get down on your knees and thank Him that in His wondrous love and mercy He took your darling just when He did; that in your home this night is no hopeless shadow of unending misery; in your ears no raving of a drink-crazed son; on your heart no weight of crushing anguish which nothing, nothing, is ever able to lift or ease.

"O God!" the voice was now broken with sobs, the suffering white face turned upwards, tears streaming down the white, drawn cheeks, and the delicate jeweled hands clasped tightly together. "O God, if to-night I could bring back the years and kneel once more by my darling's crib, and see again his little life trembling at the threshold of death, I would plead with all my soul that Thou wouldst take him to Thyself in his purity and loveliness and innocence; that Thou wouldst shelter him safe in Heaven, for there is no sure refuge in all this wicked earth. Then I might hope to meet him. Now there is no hope, for 'no drunkard can enter the Kingdom of Heaven.'"

Mrs. Bruce bowed her head into her hands and sat silent. In the revelation of this greater sorrow her rebellion frightened her. She heard nothing more, and she knew not when her strange visitor, her mission ended, quietly withdrew and left her alone.

Two hours later the husband, coming home from his office, sought his wife's room, as was his habit, to comfort her by his presence. Through the half-open door he saw her kneeling, a strange glow of peace and love on the upturned face, tears glistening in the softened eyes, and the lips moving as though in silent prayer.

Reverently he withdrew, marveling at the miracle wrought. His presence was not then needed.—Julian Hughes Persing, in Union Signal.

BARROOMS OF THE BISHOP.

Scheme of an English Prelate to Promote Cause of Temperance in England.

The people of England are much interested these days concerning the working of the plan of the bishop of Chester for dealing with the evil of excessive drinking. The bishop thinks that prohibition does not prohibit and that regulation is much better. As regulation has in view the evil done by drinking, special pains are taken to supply only the purest drinks. The houses under the bishop's scheme are to have a uniform external appearance, distinguishing them from ordinary licensed houses, notices prominently displayed that food and nonintoxicants are supplied at popular prices, the intoxicants to be placed at one end of the bar and the nonintoxicants at the other, with tables at which buns, sandwiches, tea, coffee, etc., can be served.

In villages the houses are to have club, temperance and recreation rooms, and where space is available a billiard-room and library, with backgammon, drafts and similar games, are to have also a bowling green and other counter attractions to the bar and tap room. The idea is that if is hopeless to try to extinguish thirst for stimulants, but wise to reduce the danger arising from excess or from bad whisky and beer to the minimum. The good of the drinker, not the promotion of a theory, is the main object.

PICKINGS.

The drink devil is still a potent factor in politics.—Christian Work.

When people understand what alcohol is, and what it does, they will put it out of existence.—Willard Parker, M. D.

A man finds he enjoys best health when he abstains altogether from wine and spirits, and drinks plain water.—Dr. Murchison.

A temperance restaurant in the Rue St. Antoine, Paris, is run by the Christian Endeavors. They have a daily clientele of about 100 working men.

Alcohol vitiates the blood, inflames the stomach, overtaxes the heart, destroys the kidneys, hardens the liver and softens the brain.—Norman Kerr, M. D.

John Vliet, the oldest hotel keeper in Spotswood, N. J., died there a few days ago, aged 79. He had kept a hotel for half a century, being stone blind for half of that time. Notwithstanding this affliction Vliet was an expert bartender. When he was not on duty thirsty patrons were attended by a son who was born deaf and dumb.

"Dont Speak to me."

All manner of extravagant expressions are possible when a woman's nerves are overwrought.

The spasm at the top of the wind pipe or bronchial tubes, "ball rising in the throat," violent beating of the heart, laughing and crying by turns, muscular spasms (throwing the arms about), frightened by the most insignificant occurrences—are all symptoms of a hysterical condition and serious derangement of the female organs.

Any female complaint may produce hysterics, which must be regarded as a symptom only. The cause, however, yields quickly to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, which acts at once upon the organ afflicted and the nerve centers, dispelling effectually all those distressing symptoms.

Mrs. Lewis Says: "I Feel Like a New Person, Physically and Mentally."

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I wish to speak a good word for Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. For years I had ovarian trouble and suffered everything from nervousness, severe headache, and pain in back and abdomen. I had consulted different physicians, but decided to try your medicine, and I soon found it was giving me much relief. I continued its use and now am feeling like a new person, physically and mentally, and am glad to add one more testimonial to the value of your remedy."—MRS. M. H. LEWIS, 2108 Valentine Ave., Tremont, New York, N. Y.

Writing to Mrs. Pinkham is the quickest and surest way to get the right advice about all female troubles. Her address is Lynn, Mass. She advises women free. Following is an instance:

Mrs. Haven's First Letter to Mrs. Pinkham.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I would like your advice in regard to my troubles. I suffer every month at time of menstruation, and flow so much and for so long that I become very weak, also get very dizzy. I am troubled with a discharge before and after menses, have pains in ovaries so bad sometimes that I can hardly get around, have sore feeling in lower part of bowels, pain in back, bearing-down feeling, a desire to pass urine frequently, with pains in passing it; have leucorrhœa, headache, fainting spells, and sometimes have hysteria. My blood is not in good condition. Hoping to hear from you, I am," MRS. EMMA HAVEN, 2508 South Ave., Council Bluffs, Iowa. (June 3, 1899.)

Mrs. Haven's Second Letter.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I wish to express my gratitude for what your medicine has done for me. I suffered for four years with womb trouble. Every month I flowed very badly. I got so bad that I could hardly do my work. Was obliged to sit or lie down the most of the time. I doctored for a long time, but obtained no relief. I began using your remedies—Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, Blood Purifier, Sanative Wash and Liver Pills—and now feel like a new woman."—MRS. EMMA HAVEN, 2508 South Ave., Council Bluffs, Iowa. (Feb. 1, 1900.)

SEA GIVES UP A MESSAGE.

Bottle Cast Overboard Nine Years Ago Finally Reaches Port in Norway.

Miss Ada I. Griffith, of Newark, has just received news of the finding on the coast of Norway of a message inclosed in a bottle which she cast into the Atlantic ocean nearly nine years ago while on her way from England to America. Miss Griffith is the daughter of Thomas W. Griffith, a well-known insurance man of Newark. One day in September, 1892, while returning from Europe, she wrote on an English telegraph blank form a message to W. U. Byington, a member of her party. In addition to the message she wrote: "Miss Ada I. Griffith, Mount Prospect avenue, Newark, N. J., will pay two dollars for the return of this telegram." The bottle containing the message was cast overboard at what was judged to be the middle of the ocean. The incident was forgotten. A few days ago Miss Griffith received a letter containing the original telegram. It is said that the bottle had been picked up by a poor fisherman.

The Irish of It.

One of the city physicians tells an amusing story about a charity patient, an old Irishwoman who sent him a hurry-up call. He found her suffering from nothing more serious than a severe cold, and prescribed accordingly. Two days later when he dropped in to see how she was getting along the old lady was sitting up in an easy chair, her head wrapped in a camphor-saturated cloth.

"Well, how are you feeling to-day, mother?" he asked.

"Much better, praise th' saints," was the fervent reply. "Shure you're a foine docthor. If I'd a-sint fer ye befoorhand Oi'd niver been sick at all, at all."—Detroit Free Press.

HALL & RUCKEL, NEW YORK.

THE HOUSEHOLD

OLD DARKY AT SCHOOL.

Mrs. Jennie McCorkel, of Omaha, Neb., Is 68, But Not Too Old to Learn to Read.

Mrs. Jennie McCorkel (colored), aged 68 years, is attending night school in Omaha, Neb., her purpose being to learn to read.

"I want to go to Heaven when I die," she says, "and if I'm going to do that I've got to read the Bible. But I never learned to read when I was little, so I've got to learn it now. All I'm going to school for is to learn to read the Bible. That's all I want to know."

What is true of Mrs. McCorkel is also true of Mrs. Linnie Copeland, 60 years old, and of Benjamin Jones, 55 years old. All are members of the colored colony down on the river bottoms and all are attending the night sessions of the Cass school.

They began three weeks ago, and thus far have learned the alphabet and to read words of two and three letters. They don't care to learn to write. Arithmetic is not in their curriculum and they consented to learn spelling only when told that they could not well read without it. As text-books they use Bibles, of which each has a handsome volume, bound in leather, with index and marginal notations.

"Ignorance is the curse of God, knowledge the wing wherewith we fly to Heaven," is a favorite quotation of Mrs. McCorkel, and though her teacher has frequently told her that this is from Shakespeare and not from the Bible her answer invariably is: "Well, if it ain't in the Bible, it ought to be there. It's true, anyway."

There are 40 pupils altogether in the school attended by the ancient trio, their ages ranging from seven to 68 years. All work during the day and study at night. Mmes. McCorkel and Copeland take in washing, while most of the younger ones are employed as cash girls, newsboys or messenger boys. One of the little girls, who lives just across the street, has been adopted by "Aunty" McCorkel as her special protege, and when the latter gets sleepy, as she often does about recess time, "aunty" rocks her to sleep, singing to her one of the quaint plantation chants learned many years ago down in "Ol' Vaginne." Then, when school is dismissed, she carries the child across the street to her home and puts her to bed.

A most kindly spirit of friendship exists between the young and old pupils of the school. They mingle together on terms of perfect equality and the games of childhood they play appear to be enjoyed equally by both. The younger pupils do not taunt the older ones with either their age or color, and, on the other hand, the older ones take no offense when coached by the younger ones in their studies.

Just at present Mrs. McCorkel is studying from Psalms, large portions of which she can repeat from memory.

"O clap your hands, all ye people, and shout unto God with the voice of triumph," is one of her favorite passages. The sentiment seems to appeal to her.

"She is able to read it when she sees it in print," says the teacher, "but when I transpose the words she gets confused. Silent letters are also a great bugbear to her. For example, she can't understand why 'psalm' should be spelled with a p, as, I dare say, few others can. But she is getting along nicely, and for all that I can see she is making about the same progress as a bright child of six or seven years. She is certainly the most devout soul I ever saw. The Bible is her law for every act of her life."—Chicago Chronicle.

Nice Way to Cook Turnips.

An excellent way to cook turnips is to cut half a dozen of them into thin slices, and boil 15 minutes. Remove them from the water, and after draining place in a baking dish and pour over them a half-pint of clear soup stock heated and seasoned with salt, cayenne, sugar and nutmeg. Bake until tender, and baste from time to time with the stock. If the turnips are old it will be necessary to leave them in the open about 30 minutes. Serve on a hot platter with the pan gravy, to which have been added butter and flour to thicken.

Fresh Eggs Do Not Float.

The freshness of eggs may be determined by placing them in water. A stale egg floats, but a new-laid one sinks to the bottom.

THE PRINCESS VICTORIA.

King Edward's Youngest Daughter, Though Still Unwed, Has Had a Pretty Love Romance.

What Princess Beatrice was for many years to Queen Victoria—her closest friend and confidante, the youngest daughter of Edward VII., one of the late queen's numerous namesakes, will be to Queen Alexandra. Victoria disliked intensely three things; gas, cats and old maids, and it was a source of extreme annoyance that the youngest, cleverest and least plain of the Wales girls insisted upon remaining unwed. But the father and mother of the willful young woman, whether they abetted her design or not, were at least acquiescent, and it is a fact that she had a much more generous provision made for her than either of her sisters enjoyed during their girlhood.

THE PRINCESS VICTORIA.

Princess Victoria is 32 years old and has lost the girlish prettiness which she once owned. She has an aristocratic face, but her features lack animation, and the general effect is rather heavy and dull. She is very reserved, prefers books to balls, and a quiet country life, with dogs, horses and a few chosen friends, to the gay round of society.

Ther is a romantic story concerning Princess Victoria, which purports to account for spinsterhood. It is said that she fell madly in love with a handsome young Indian prince who visited the English court some years ago. The dark-skinned Prince Charming was amiable, enlightened, highly educated and fabulously rich, and he returned the princess' affection with ardor. He was entertained at Sandringham, and in the course of a walk in the garden found an opportunity to propose to the young woman. She accepted him, provisionally, of course. A princess can do no more. The prince of Wales favored the alliance, but the princess, a remarkably proud woman, by the way, opposed it bitterly. The queen was also against the lovers. However, it was not deemed wise to refuse point-blank so powerful a ruler, even if he were of a subject race, so he was advised to return to India and let the matter be discussed by the princess' family. He went, and within a very short time died—a victim to the plague. The members of the royal family not directly concerned breathed sighs of polite regret and private relief. Princess Victoria suffered deeply She has never been very strong since and has appeared but little in society. She wished to become an army nurse, but a princess is denied the solace of hard work, which has done so much for aching hearts the world over. She wears always a souvenir of her prince—a ruby ring which was brought her after his death by a servant.

Lately gossip has betrothed her to Prince George of Greece, but there has been no official announcement of the engagement. If she remains unmarried, her long seclusion will have to be broken now. The pomp and magnificence of Edward's court will force her to take her proper place as the only unmarried daughter of the house. The queen, it is well known, suffers from deafness, and shrinks from all except imperative public duties, so that Victoria will be called upon to represent her mother as Princess Beatrice did so often the late queen.—Detroit Free Press.

TO RULE HUSBANDS.

Startling Development of the So-Called New Womanhood Among the Wives of Berlin.

Germany has of late years been the stronghold of masculinity. The German women have been held up as paragons of all domestic virtues and steadfastly opposed to new womanhood. But even in Germany the throne of man is shaking.

Berlin now has an Association of Married Women for the Control of Husbands. The constitution and by-laws haven't been made public, and the meetings are private, but the name alone opens broad vistas of speculation as to the functions of the association.

Presumably the women will all read papers and compare experiences, and the discussions will take on a reminiscent and anecdotal character that will make them even livelier than a Sorosis election day.

Of course, American club women will look pityingly at their Teutonic sisters' effort to throw off the yoke. Organized effort toward the control of husbands isn't necessary over here. As the Wonderland Red Queen would say: "Oh, we passed that long ago."

Each American woman controls her own husband with an ease that leaves her time and energy for problems more vital. Still, the German women have made a step in the right direction.

What the feelings of the German husband are when he sees his wife setting forth to a meeting of the A. M. W. F. C. H. is beyond conjecturing.

THE FARMING WORLD

MAKING A HOTBED.

Although Most Gardeners Know How, Yet a Few General Hints Will Not Come Amiss.

The making of hotbeds is a matter so commonly understood as perhaps scarcely to require going into at this time, yet the following from Vick, dealing as it does principally with the proper heating of the beds, may not come amiss to those interested in starting cabbage, celery, lettuce, etc., in early spring:

The ordinary hotbed consists of a pile of fermenting stable manure, covered with a frame and glazed sashes, in which is a layer of fertile soil. The bed should be located where it will be easy of access, but it should be on dry ground and not where water could flow over the ground and about its base, even in wet weather. It should also be sheltered from heavy winds, and with a full exposure to the sun. In preparation for a bed the fresh manure and long litter are collected from stables and drawn together to the location of the bed, where it is placed in a conical pile. As the manure is thus thrown together it is packed down by treading on it, the treading being repeated as the bed is raised a few inches at a time, until the pile is finished off to a point at the top.

After a few days it may be noticed that the pile is heating by seeing steam rise from it. It is then customary to handle over the manure, shaking it out and again making it into a pile and tramping it down as before. In two or three days the signs of heating will again be evident, and it is then ready to be made into a bed. The bed should be made large enough to extend at least a foot outside of the frame at the sides and ends. In throwing the manure into shape as the pile rises in height every few inches it should be beaten down with the back of the fork so that the material will be of uniform density. The bed should be two feet or two and one-half feet in depth. The deeper it is the steadier and longer continued will be the heat.

Whn the bed is finished evenly on top the frame can be set on and covered with the sashes. In a few days a strong heat will rise, and when this abates somewhat, so that the thermometer thrust into the manure indicates only 85 or 90 degrees, a layer of rich, mellow soil that has been previously prepared should be placed in the frame and spread evenly over the bed to a depth of about six inches.

The bed is now ready for use, and seed sowing in it can commence. In the management of a hotbed constant reference must be made to a shaded thermometer kept inside, and air must be given sufficiently to keep the temperature down to about 70 degrees.

THE FAMILY ORCHARD.

Apple Trees Had Best Be Planted in the Spring and Afterward Cultivated with Care.

Something of my experience may be of benefit to some one like myself who is trying to have a family orchard and succeed in raising apple trees. I have found that it does not pay to set a tree that is not thrifty and vigorous, no matter what the age may be. I have had good success with four-year-old trees and also with two and three year trees. In setting the tree I dig the hole large enough to accommodate all the roots, throw in enough well pulverized soil to cover the roots well, and then pour in about one-half gallon of water to settle the dirt firmly around the roots and exclude all the air, then fill up with soil. My trees never fail to grow. I think spring the proper time to plant. The greatest trouble with me has been to keep the borers from killing the trees. To prevent this I wrap them with paper, letting it extend an inch or two below the surface of the ground. I do this early in the spring after examining tree to see that no borer remains it there to be wrapped up for the summer. A young fruit tree must be cultivated. Don't expect a tree set in sod to grow and bear fruit. If left to shift for itself the result will be a stunted dwarf that will drop out about the time it should begin o bear if properly taken care of. Go through the young orchard some time during the winter and pick off and burn all those little bunches of leaves seen hanging to the twigs. Each one contains an egg that as soon as warm weather comes, and the tree begins to bud, will hatch into a worm that will eat the leaves off your tree faster than they can grow. Remember that in raising an orchard, as in a great many other things, untiring vigilance is the price of success.—J. L. Smith, in Prairie Farmer.

A UNITED STATES MARSHAL

Thanks Peruna For His Rapid Recovery From Catarrh.

EX-UNITED STATES MARSHAL MATTHEWS, OF MISSISSIPPI.

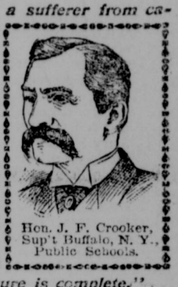
Hon. S. S. Matthews, ex-United States Marshal of Mississippi, in a recent letter to The Peruna Medicine Company of Columbus, Ohio, written from Hazelhurst, Miss., says:

"I am happy to say that I am cured of catarrh and need no more attention from you. It is a great satisfaction that I am able to write you that Peruna has in my case done all that you claim, and that I will need no more medicine."

The great multitude take this remedy without any other advice than the directions to be found upon the bottle and in the pamphlets. There are those who prefer, however, to correspond with Dr. Hartman during their sickness. To all such he will make prompt and careful answer without charge.

Hon. J. F. Crooker, of Buffalo, N. Y., who was for years Superintendent of Schools at Buffalo, in a letter dated October 16 writes:

"I have been a sufferer from catarrh six or seven years, and after trying many remedies was induced by a friend to take Peruna. The results have been highly satisfactory. I take pleasure in recommending Peruna to any one suffering with catarrh, as my cure is complete."



Hon. J. F. Crooker, Sup't Buffalo, N. Y., Public Schools.

Hon. B. B. Dovinер, Congressman from West Virginia, in a letter from Washington, D. C., to The Peruna Medicine Co., says the following of their catarrh remedy, Peruna:

"I join with my colleagues in the House of Representatives in recommending your excellent remedy, Peruna, as a good tonic and also an effective cure for catarrh."

Mrs. Mary C. Fentress writes from Paradise, Tex., the following: "I think I can say that your good advice and medicine has cured me of chronic catarrh. I have had no pains in my head since I have taken Peruna. I have been in bad health ever since '59, and have taken a good many medicines which were only of temporary relief. Peruna is the catarrh cure. The Peruna stopped my catarrh of the head so that it did not become chronic, and I am very thankful for Dr. Hartman's advice and medicine."

Peruna is a specific for all catarrhal diseases. It acts quickly and beneficially upon the inflamed mucous membrane thus removing the cause of catarrh.

Catarrh is catarrh wherever located. Catarrh is essentially the same everywhere. The remedy that will cure catarrh in one situation will cure it in all situations.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

Address Dr. Hartman, President of The Hartman Sanitarium, Columbus, O.

EASILY ACQUIRED FAME.

He Was Running for Office and Got the Big Boost Just to Help Him Along.

"I never realized how easily a man may court fame and get undeserved credit for a very ordinary act until I got into politics," observed the modest aldermanic candidate, relates the Detroit Free Press.

"The other day I stepped out into the street and stopped a walk-away nag attached to a heavily-loaded brick wagon. The animal had simply strayed away while the driver went to get a glass of beer or something. I don't believe the old ring-boned animal had the ambition to run away even if he had a light wagon behind him, and he certainly was going at a cold molasses gait when I stopped him. As I 'geed' the horse around and returned him to the curb one of my admiring constituents who touched me for campaign expenses occasionally, rushed up and, grabbing my hand, exclaimed:

"'By George, old boy, that was a brave act! I expected to see you trampled under the horse's hoofs any minute.'

"Then a very inquisitive young man whom I might have recognized as a newspaper reporter advanced and plied me with questions. That evening my attention was called to a windy, not to say 'fierce,' article in which I was described as a great hero. It was headed 'Daring Deed—An Aldermanic Candidate Stops a Runaway Horse at the Risk of His Life,' and a graphic word picture was drawn of flying bricks, plunging horses and scurrying pedestrians.

"It was a great send-off and the enthusiastic constituent who was the first to congratulate me touched me for a 'five-spot' on the strength of it."

A Very Remarkable Remedy.

"It is with a good deal of pleasure and satisfaction that I recommend Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy," says Druggist A. W. Sawtelle, of Hartford, Conn. "A lady customer, seeing the remedy exposed for sale on my show case, said to me: 'I really believe that medicine saved my life the past summer while at the shore,' and she became so enthusiastic over its merits that I at once made up my mind to recommend it in the future. Recently a gentleman came into my store so overcome with colic pains that he sank at once to the floor. I gave him a dose of this remedy which helped him. I repeated the dose and in fifteen minutes he left my store smilingly informing me that he felt as well as ever." Sold by all dealers.

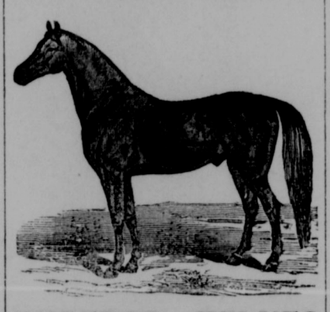
Beware of a Cough.

A cough is not a disease but a symptom. Consumption and bronchitis, which are the most dangerous and fatal diseases, have for their first indication a persistent cough, and if properly treated as soon as this cough appears are easily cured. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy has proven wonderfully successful, and gained its wide reputation and extensive sale by its success in curing the diseases which cause coughing. If it is not beneficial it will not cost you a cent. For sale by all dealers.

The Wilkes Stallion



EMPEROR WILKES
TIME, 2.28.

Will stand at the stables of the undersigned in Oakland on the following terms:

$10 to Insure a Mare With Foal.

Money to be paid when mare is known to be with foal. Persons parting with a mare or fails to attend forfeits insurance money. A lien will be retained on the colt until insurance is paid. We will not be responsible for accidents should any occur, but the best of care to prevent such will be exerted.

This horse has a record of 2.34. On a trial he trotted a mile in 2.28. He is a full brother of WILL KERR, 2.07¼, Champion Green Harness Horse of the World, and also of VINETTE, 2.09¼.

EMPEROR WILKES is a dark bay stallion, snip on nose, black points, height 15¾ hands. He was bred by Thompson & Bro., Cynthiana, Ky. He comes from the best trotting family of horses in this country and has a bright future. He is the sire of the fastest colts in Garrett county and is without doubt the best bred stallion and the fastest trotting animal in Western Maryland.

SEVEN DEVELOPED GOLD MINES.

60 ACRES OF GOLD ORE

THE ARENA

Gold Mining and Milling Company

CRIPPLE CREEK, COLORADO.

This Property is Estimated to be now Worth More than $10,000 per Acre and will be Worth over One Hundred Thousand Dollars per Acre, with Proper Development.

CAPITAL STOCK, $1,000,000,

Divided into Shares of $1.00 Each, Full Paid and Non-Assessable.

The Arena Company offers 50,000 Shares at 50 cents each in a Property that is Worth over $600,000

For the purpose of raising money to purchase the necessary machinery to make the mines produce daily fully THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS IN GOLD, thus enriching every individual shareholder according to the shares he holds.

YOU CAN BUY ANY NUMRER OF SHARES YOU WISH,

and make more money than can be made in any other line of investment. The gold ore is in these seven developed mines. There are 3,000 feet of ore in a vein, and these veins are true mother veins, held within walls of granite, placed there by nature. The Company has already developed this property to demonstrate that it is one of the largest gold properties of the Cripple Creek District which is the greatest gold-producing camp on earth, its output last year aggregating $24,000,000, or nearly double the amount produced in the whole State of California.

At 50 cents per Share the Company is giving you a discount of 10 cents per share to start with, making 20 cents on the dollar. As already stated, this is done for the purpose of raising $25,000 to purchase improved machinery, air-compressor drills and electric plant. We have two large hoisting engines on this property, a commodious shaft-house, office buildings, boarding house for the men, stables, a powder-house, a large quantity of tools, etc. The reports on these mines, made by one of the best mining engineers in the State, succinctly describe these improvements.

NAMES OF MINES.

AZTEC, 210 feet in depth, with shaft-house, boiler and engine for hoisting, well timbered all the way down.
BONDHOLDER, 260 feet deep, hoisting engine and boiler, large iron shaft-house.
MEXICO AND MANHATTAN, both over 100 feet deep, on same vein as the Aztec mine.
CRYSTAL, JASPER AND GREAT EASTERN, on the same vein as the Bondholder, and opened in depth of 100 feet, and developments already made show over 4,000 feet of ore.

If you want to make money out of nature, become a producer of gold out of her treasure-vaults. The Arena group of mines will do it for you.

We can furnish the best of references—bank and mining engineers—and our title in the property is perfect, coming as it does through a patent from the Government. With more improved machinery, from $3,000 to $5,000 per day will be a conservative estimate of the output of these mines.

Remember that only 50,000 shares of this stock are for sale at 50 cents on the dollar. Orders for the number of shares desired, accompanied by Draft, Money Orders, Express or Cash in Registered Letters, can be sent to

The Arena Gold Mining and Milling Company,

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 25. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, MAY 30, 1901. NUMBER 12.

GORMAN WILL BE DEFEATED DECLARES A BRYAN LEADER.

Bryan's Personal Friend Says the Senator

CANNOT CARRY MARYLAND.

The Maryland Representative of the Defeated Democratic Candidate for President Raps Mr. Gorman Severely—"He is the Power On the Throne," Says Mr. S. S. Field, of Baltimore.

Mr. S. S. Field, the prominent silver leader and the personal friend and representative of William Jennings Bryan in Maryland when the Nebraskan was a candidate for President of the United States, declared in an authorized interview that Mr. Gorman cannot carry Maryland next fall. And here are his reasons:

"The result of the recent election in Baltimore means that the Democratic party cannot win this fall with ex-Senator Gorman as its candidate for the United States Senate.

"Mr. Gorman was the captain on deck, with Mr. Rasin at the wheel, when the boat went down. Having recovered from the sore throat with which he suffered during the campaign last fal' Mr. Gorman openly assumed command of the party, and personally took charge of the movement for the extra session and the passage of the new election law, the defeat of the primary election bill, and the passage of the census bill to distribute $45,000 of the State's money among his followers. He was not 'the power behind the throne,' but the power on the throne in the whole matter. After the adjournment of the Legislature his interest in the approaching election was shown by frequent visits to Baltimore.

"Mr. William F. Porter, speaking as is generally supposed for Mr. Rasin and Mr. John J. Mahon, one of the foremost of the Gorman leaders in 1895 had declared, in carefully prepared interviews, 'that the Democratic party should take its position in favor of the re-election of Mr. Gorman to the United States Senate,' and that 'Gorman should be the issue,' and in the recent campaign Democratic orators predicted that a Democratic victory this spring would mean a Gorman victory this fall. Among others, Mr. Alonzo L. Miles, the law partner of Senator Gorman's son, declared in addressing a Democratic mass meeting that a Democratic victory would be an endorsement of Mr. Gorman for the Senate; and State Senator Olin Bryan, at another meeting, said that a Democratic victory might give Mr Gorman a start for the Presidential nomination in 1904.

"In the primary contest Mr. Rasin had triumphed in every ward except two, and in those the Democrats won. The election of the two Democrats who had defeated Rasin in the primaries and the defeat of almost all of the Gorman-Rasin candidates was the response of the voters of Baltimore to the invitation to endorse Mr. Gorman for the Senate and give him a start for the White House.

"The lesson of 1895 and 1897 was repeated in the Baltimore election of May 7, 1901. Following the open leadership of the party assumed by Mr. Gorman in reference to the extra session, the appointment of Mr. Schley, a '92 Gorman lieutenant, to have charge of the census in the State, and of Mr. Fledderman, a '95 Rasin lieutenant, to have charge in Baltimore city, the reappearance of Mr. Rasin, the chief lieutenant of Mr. Gorman in 1895, in the undisguised control of the party in this city, and the triumph of his candidates in the primaries, the Democratic defeat unquestionably means that the people of Baltimore will not, in 1901, vote to re-establish the identical bossism in the person of the same individual leaders which they voted to overthrow in 1895.

"And as goes Baltimore so goes Maryland, for there is not in recent years a single instance in which the State and city have failed to vote the same way. Always both have gone Democratic or both Republican, and if we want to make an exception to the rule this year we must remove the cause that operated in 1895, 1897 and in the recent election. It can be done. The Democratic party can win this fall, for there is scarcely a doubt that a majority of the people of Maryland are Democrats and will elect the Democratic ticket whenever its candidates receive the loyal support of the entire party.

"It is just as certain that a large number of Democrats will not support the party when led by Mr. Gorman.

"In 1895 he was the sole issue, and he was beaten by nearly 20,000, though he had control of the election machinery. He was beaten again in 1897 and in 1899 he himself, or the Democratic managers, were so sensible of Mr. Gorman's unpopularity that he did not appear at a meeting or take part, openly, either in the Hayes or the Smith campaign for fear that his doing so would defeat the Democratic ticket. He did not gain any new friends in the campaign of 1900. It was unfortunate that he should have contracted a severe cold just in time to prevent his appearance at the big Music Hall meeting, at which he had been advertised to open the campaign for Bryan and which had been gotten up especially for him; and that his cold should have incapacitated him during the whole campaign, when he was so anxious to take off his coat and work for the nominee, as he had previously, in several interviews, declared he had intended to do.

"And so he has been beaten again.

"There is a fatality in three successive defeats. The most expert swimmer is beyond the succor of the rescue crew when he has sunk the third time. The third stroke of paralysis is fatal.

"Measured by the test of success, Mr. Gorman has been great. His skill was shown in an organization which could overthrow his chief and make him absolute master of the Democratic party. As long as the State remained Democratic his star was in the ascendent; it sunk when the State went Republican, in 1895.

"His day is passed.

"Let his friends bow to the verdict of the people, thrice expressed; let them not insist on again sacrificing the whole party in the hopeless effort to re-enthrone him; let the rank and file of the party select a candidate for the United States Senate who can gain the support of all Democrats; let the candidates for the Legislature be pledged to him, and also pledged to the passage of a fair and effective primary election law, and Democracy can win.

"But Gormanism can't win."

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Our summer people are beginning to drop into our midst. The past few days among the arrivals have been: Mrs. L. B. C. List, of Wasnington, D. C.; Col. Smith and O. S. McKinney, Fairmont, W. Va.; W. W. McConnell, Wheeling; Mrs. Allcock and family, Baltimore; Dr. Mills and wife, New York city.

The interior of the tabernacle is being whitewashed. If the weather will permit the services next Sabbath, 11 a. m., will be held in the tabernacle. Dr. Mills, of New York City, one of the brightest and most eloquent pulpit orators in the land, will be the speaker.

Next Saturday at 7.30 p. m. Chaplain Arbuthnot will conduct a platform meeting in the Methodist church. The speakers are Drs. Mills and Weir and Rev. A. Mick. Dr. Jones will have charge of the singing. Dr. Weir is president of the West Virginia Conference Seminary. Sabbath at 7.30 Dr. Warden, a veteran Methodist preacher, is to occupy the pulpit. This is a great opportunity to hear great men. Tell your neighbors about the meeting.

Death entered the home of Mrs. S. A. Bond Saturday last and took away a loving daughter and an affectionate sister. The funeral services were conducted by Revs. Davis and Rudisill Sabbath at 3.30 p. m. Monday the remains were taken to Buckhannon for burial.

J. L. Echard is doing excellent work on the road between Oakland and the Park. He is widening it to full 30 feet. The new county road from the railroad to Deer Park for a long distance from the station is almost filled up with lumber and mining props, so much so that the supervisors cannot work the road. As far as the public is concerned the road might as well be abandoned.

The work of putting the Mountain Lake Hotel in order for a big business is progressing nicely. C. F. Dawson has a force of men painting the inside as well as the outside of the hotel. He is also papering a number of rooms. The plumbers and electricians have completed their work. The hotel certainly does present an inviting appearance.

Our postoffice has received a full supply of the Pan-American postage stamps.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, May 27.—The five cadets who were recently dismissed from the West Point Military Academy for alleged insubordination called at the war department this morning and sought an audience with Secretary Root. Their names are Henry L. Bowlby, of Nebraska; John A. Cleveland, of Alabama; Trangott F. Kelley, of New York; Raymond A. Linton, of Michigan, and Birchie O. Mahaffey, of Texas. They came alone, but were joined soon after by Senator Cockrell, of Missouri, and Senator Hawley, of Connecticut, each of whom saw Secretary Root separately and urged that the boys be given a hearing. Senator Cockrell is especially interested in the case of young Cleveland, who is a son of an officer who served in Senator Cockrell's brigade during the war of the rebellion.

Senator Hawley told the Secretary of War that his only interest in the cadets arose from a desire to have them treated with kindness, and given an opportunity to state their side of the case. One of the cadets, speaking for all of them, had an interview with Senator Hawley, and after hearing the statement the Senator thought they were entitled to a hearing before the Secretary of War. Further than making a request for the hearing, Senator Hawley has no connection with the matter.

Secretary Root said that he would see the cadets at 2.30 o'clock this afternoon, but simply for the purpose of hearing what they had to say in their own behalf, and with no idea of reversing the action already taken by the department, which resulted in their discharge from the Military Academy.

The dismissed cadets claim that they have been tried and condemned without a hearing, and without knowing the testimony against them, or having an opportunity to reply to it. The law officers of the department who have investigated the matter say that there is no way in which dismissed cadets can be restored to the academy, save by reappointment through the representative of the district to which each is accredited, which must have the approval of the academic board at West Point.

It is stated at the navy department that no definite information has been received there regarding the time of the launching of the battleship Maine or the selection of the sponsor for the ship on that occasion. The published statement that the vessel would be launched on Memorial day is evidently premature and unauthorized. No official information on the point has yet been received at the navy department. Captain Sigsbee, chief of the naval intelligence office, has made a statement in regard to the selection of the Maine sponsor in which he says:

"It has been the invariable custom for the battle ships built for the United States to be christened by some maiden selected after the firm building the ship had consulted with the governor of the State for which it was to be named. I am sure that this procedure will be followed in the case of the new Maine.

"I desire most sincerely to make it plain that no member of my family has sought this honor either directly or indirectly. We recognize that, being natives of New York State, we have no claim on the governor of Maine."

Although there is no definite information on that point, there is an impression that the governor will designate Miss Caroline Frye Biggs, granddaughter of the senior Senator from Maine, to christen the battle ship.

George A. C. Christianey, acting assistant attorney general for the postoffice department, today recommended to the acting postmaster general that a fraud order be issued against the American News Clipping Company of Chicago. The recommendation has been approved and the order has been issued.

It is charged that the company named advertised that $8 a hundred would be paid for newspaper clippings. Persons who wrote to the company were informed that the necessary outfit would cost $2.75. Upon receipt of this sum an outfit of small value would be sent and the correspondent would be advised that $8 a hundred would be paid for press clippings relating to spinal curvature and locomotor ataxia. There was also sent a schedule of prices which would be paid for clippings upon rare subjects.

The company was cited to appear before the attorney general for the postoffice department and show cause why a fraud order should not be issued, but owing, it is said, to the disappearance of the "company" from the address advertised, the notice to show cause could not be served.

The adjutant general received a cable message this morning from Gen. Chaffee at Taku, China, saying that the transports Sumner and Lenox would sail today for the Philippines with all the American troops at that point. The Sumner is a troopship and the Lenox an animal ship. It is not understood here how these two vessels can take the entire army of Gen. Chaffee, including horses and equipment. Four vessels in all were assigned to this service, including the troopship Indiana and the freight ship Aztec. Smallpox recently broke out on the Indiana and has evidently prevented her use in the transportation of the China troops.

A draft of seventy-five men is being made up aboard the receiving ship Vermont at the New York navy yard to go to San Francisco on June 8 and to take passage aboard the Philadelphia for the Samoan Islands, where they will be assigned to duty on board the station ship Abaranda at Pago Pago.

Secretary Gage was at his desk today, having returned from Chicago. He found hundreds letters expressing deep sympathy in the loss of his wife.

Capt. Shoemaker, of the revenue cutter service, has received word that the revenue cutter Grant, which ran into a reef off the coast of Victoria, B. C., has been floated and taken to Victoria.

Chief Wilkie, of the United States secret service, has received word of the arrest of John Speziale and Herman Hubbard, charged with making counterfeit coins, which, it is stated, have been put in circulation in New York, Connecticut and Rhode Island. A quantity of materials and $5,500 in bogus money were confiscated.

BLOOMINGTON.

Piedmont Independent.

Rev. Mr. Osborn, Episcopalian minister at Oakland, filled an appointment at Frankville last Sunday, and in order to make home next day walked overland to Piedmont to catch the express train. The reverend gentleman looked as fresh at the end of the journey as if he had only been taking a morning stroll.

Mr. and Mrs. Stine, of Westernport, were guests of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Michael Flynn, last Sunday. In the afternoon they were joined by her sister, Mrs. Joseph Beaman, of "Gobbler's Knob."

James Devine and little daughter, of Lonaconing, visited his sister, Mrs. John Collins, Sunday.

D. H. Mason, of Winchester, Va., brother-in-law of Mr. Shade, moved to Seldom Seen last Monday.

The Ambrose property is receiving a thorough overhauling and repairs by Contractor Liller, of Keyser. It was certainly needed, as the building was one of the most dilapidated looking structures in town.

James Titchnell has secured the contract for painting the bridge across Savage River at Frog Hollow.

George Warnick, our enterprising merchant, has extensive improvements on hand in the shape of a grainary and cold storage rooms. The lumber for the building arrived this week and work will commence at once.

Mrs. Smith, wife of S. P. Smith, of the West Union Record, West Union, W. Va., returned home on last Friday. During her visit she was the guest of Miss Lotta Kemp.

Mrs. Lewis Kennel, of Garrett, Pa., is visiting the Kennel family at Lochiel and other relatives in town.

Deaton Butts, Thos. Wildman and E. C. Bosley, of near Cross, were visitors to town during the week.

Miss Barrick, daughter of James Barrick, of Windom, was in town on Thursday.

Miss Fannie Kight returned from Cumberland on Wednesday.

Sheriff Oester, of Oakland, had business in town Monday, and during his stay did not forget to put in a word or two for several candidates he is interested in for next fall's election.

E. Whitworth, fire insurance agent, and H. G. Richardson, life insurance agent, of Piedmont—you might call them death and destruction—were in town the first of the week looking up new business.

G. C. Pattison is in line with the march of improvement that has struck our town. He is having new additions and changes made to his home.

John Liller, county road supervisor on the West Virginia side, has made decided improvement in the county road between Savage and Hampshire hill. He has changed the location, taking out numerous curves and heavy grades.

Gilbert Warnick, with a gang of men, was employed all day Thursday in removing a landslide on road above Frog Hollow.

ELKS' OUTING.

Herds From Four States To Visit Oakland During June.

The Elks of West Virginia are going to hold an outing down at the beautiful mountain summer resort of Oakland, Md., June 13-15, and the outing will be participated in by other members of the B. P. O. E. from Maryland, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Several hundred are expected to attend.

This is the first outing the Elks have had in West Virginia, and the woods about Oakland will be full of the wearers of the antlers, on the three days mentioned. This outing is not in West Virginia, either, but West Virginia Elks inspired the gathering, and Oakland is not any distant neighbor to the mountain state. This is how the plan to have an outing came about:

Capt. Carney, the jolly and popular Baltimore and Ohio passenger conductor, is an enthusiastic Elk. He was figuring on his vacation this summer, and concluded that he would enjoy nothing better than to spend a few days at Oakland, that picturesque region of the "Glades." He was telling a brother Elk about it and said he wished he might join him. "Why not have all the Elks there?" the Captain ejaculated, and thereupon he set about to carry out the plan.

Mannington Lodge, No. 388, B. P. O. E. took up the matter, and has made all the preliminary arrangements. There will be cheap rates on the railroad, and a special rate at the Oakland Hotel, for all Elks and their lady friends.

On the first night there will be an elaborate banquet, and served by a Washington caterer. On the following night there will be a grand ball, with an excellent orchestra to furnish the music. During the day the Elks will roam the woods, fish, hunt, sleep, bowl, play billiards or enjoy themselves in any other way they see fit. There will be a band in attendance. It will be an enjoyable time, one which these jolly Elks will long remember.—Mannington Advocate.

National Educational Association.

The National Educational Association will meet at Detroit, July 8 to 12 inclusive.

The most prominent educators of the country will assemble there to discuss matters of great interest to the teachers and others interested in school work. The work done at this Convention is food for thought for the teachers who attend.

The Maryland party will leave Baltimore, Saturday, July 6th, and go to Detroit over the Lehigh Valley Railroad to Niagara, and thence along the northern shore of Lake Erie by the Grand Trunk Railroad, crossing the St. Clair River to Detroit, where they will arrive Sunday afternoon.

They will remain at Detroit until Wednesday evening or Thursday, attending the Convention and visiting the numerous places of interest around Detroit.

They will leave Detroit by one of the steamers on Lake Erie, and take the delightful ride down Lake Erie to Buffalo, where they will visit the Pan-American Exposition; and then go to Niagara Falls, from which beautiful Lake region of New York and mountains of Pennsylvania, to Philadelphia or New York, where return tickets will be furnished them, and the teachers will then be at liberty to go to Atlantic City or any other point that they please.

State Superintendent Stephens, who is State Director for the N. E. A., has placed the arrangements of this trip in the hands of Mr. H. M. Hebden, Union Trust Building, Baltimore, Md., who has planned most carefully for the comfort and pleasure of the teachers who may go on this trip.

The price of the ticket will be very low, and will include all necessary expenses.

This is an exceptional opportunity for the teachers to attend the meeting of the National Educational Association, and visit the Pan-American Exposition, as well as Niagara Falls.

Descriptive circulars of this trip will be ready about May 25.

Typhoid From Well Water.

The analysis of samples of water from two public wells sent to State Chemist Penniman by Health Officer Spear, shows that the water is wholly unfit for drinking purposes, being impregnated with poisonous animal matter. To the use of water from one of these wells 12 cases of typhoid fever are directly attributed. The wells have been in use for years, and no steps have been taken for their purification. To avoid an epidemic of typhoid the sanitary authorities have decided to forbid the use of the contaminated water. Typhoid in Cumberland has been alarmingly fatal recently, and measures of precatuion are imperative. Master Mechanic Billingham, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, is seriously ill with the disease.—Cumberland News.

CORKSCREW PHILOSOPHY.

A word to the new women—better babies than ballots.

What is home without a mother—homes of that kind are very common now.

The new woman is not in harmony with nature—hence her unrest and unnatural desires.

When mother-hood fails the nation fails. The new woman should paste this in her bonnet and buy a cradle.

And now the doctors say that the bottle fed baby is a reproach to modern womanhood.

Nature is democratic, she persists in laying her foundations with the lowliest. Christ was born in a manger.

The brawn of the nation rests with the poor and the lowly,—poverty, as yet, has never been ashamed of its babies.

Science says that the bottle fed baby will be a loser in the race with the sturdier kind raised in the natural way. Give the babies their rights and don't bother about the ballots is sound advice for the new woman.

It is a stubborn fact that the leading men of the world have sprung from the common people. Every step away from nature is a step in the wrong direction. Better be a blessed mother than a babbling crank.

JACKSON.

Communicated.

To the Honorable Board of School Commissioners of Garrett County:

GENTLEMEN:—I notice by the county press that the Board of County Commissioners has levied the sum of two thousand dollars for the erection of new school houses in various sections of the county where they are most needed. The levying of such sum for the purposes mentioned was in the opinion of the people a very commendable act. I desire briefly to recite to your honorable body a few facts in regard to the need and urgent necessity of erecting new school buildings in District No. 9. We pay more taxes in proportion and receive less than any district in the county, our assessment being nearly half million dollars. We have but three buildings for school purposes in the district and need just as many more. In the western part of the district, where the Wilhelms, Meeses, Nedrows and the settlers of the Blue Jay Lumber Company reside, they have been without a school these many years; in the northern part of the district, where the McKenzies, Dursts, Bakers and Bittingers reside, they have never had a school room; and last, but not least, in the southern part of the district, where the hardy pioneers have converted the wilds of Savage mountain into fields of beauty, reside a settlement of people who have never had a school to send their children to and the settlement is of sufficient size to gather enough children for a good sized school.

In the three points of the district mentioned are upwards of one hundred boys and girls whose parents desire school rooms where their children may at least get the fundamental rudiments of a common school education which is so much desired and needed by every boy and girl in these enlightened days.

There is to the writer's knowledge boys and girls grown to manhood and womanhood who were never inside of a school room, and the reader may ask, "Why didn't the parents educate their children?" I will answer and say that the parents have to toil early and late for their daily bread, and they themselves were denied the good of an education because when they were boys and girls there was no school to attend.

While I am aware that it would be impossible for the board to erect three new houses in our district, I do earnestly hope that the board will give the matter careful consideration and that they will come and look over the ground themselves and I know as fair minded men they will decide that the people in those sections of the district are sadly in need of a school room where their children may be educated, and if they cannot build three new houses that we may get one each year until our people's wants are satisfied.

Respectfully yours,
P. E. FINZEL.

Dramatic Entertainment.

"The Woven Web," a beautiful and fascinating war drama in four acts, will be produced by local talent in Shartzer's Opera House to-night (Thursday) for the benefit of the new Catholic church in Oakland. Specialties will be introduced between acts. A concert will be given by Smith's Military Band in front of the opera house before the performance begins. Seats are selling rapidly and the attendance will no doubt be large.

A RACE WITH TIME

BEING A TALE OF A STAFF CORRESPONDENT.

"RUNNING battle in the streets of Summitville between citizens and bandits last night. Several people killed. Plan to loot town."

The message came in from an Indiana town late one afternoon. The office expert on time tables went to work at once and figured out that there was just time to catch the famous world's fair flyer which ran between Chicago and New York. The staff correspondent, with telegraph operator and an assistant, was sent post-haste to catch that train, with instructions to get off at Valparaiso and take an accommodation train which left Summitville half an hour later. He was to get an account of what had happened there, and get it into the office by telegraph before midnight without fail.

At the station in Chicago it developed that the flyer was not scheduled to stop until it reached Cleveland. An interview with the engineer developed that the train slowed up at Valparaiso for some purpose or other, and that a quick man, who was willing to run some chances, might get off there.

"I guess there won't nobody stop you, boys," said the engineer as he swung up into the cab. "We're slowed down at Valparaiso so a man can jump off if he has a mind to."

On the way down through the Indiana sand dunes, with the big mogul engine doing its 50 miles an hour, a local time table was found which showed that the time of the accommodation train had been changed. Instead of leaving half an hour after the flyer was due, it was scheduled to pull out for Summitville in less than ten minutes.

"Yes," said a railroad man who happened to be on board, "and the depots are nearly a mile apart, at that."

As the flyer began to slow up at Valparaiso the three men who were bound for Summitville jumped off the rear coach and ran to the station. Not a hack or other public vehicle was in sight.

Backed up to the depot platform was a light delivery wagon with a lanky white mare hitched to it. The three men clambered into the back of this wagon and started at a gallop for the other station, in front of which the accommodation train was already standing. As the old mare started on a jump the terrified boy ran out of the station depot and just managed to catch the tailboard of the wagon. In a minute he was in the drivers' seat. Fortunately he was a youth who could rise to an emergency.

"Five dollars if you get us to that station in time," he was told, and a peeled hickory switch put added vigor into the mare's leaps. Right through the center of the town went the wild race, and people hung out of the windows and ran into the streets to watch the chase. Every time a crossing was passed the whole outfit bounced high into the air and "A dollar more if you drive a little faster" some one gasped as it struck the ground again. For the accommodation train had already got steam up and was beginning to show plain signs of impatience.

"I GUESS THERE WON'T NOBODY STOP YOU, BOYS."

Boy and mare both did their best and the three men were just able to climb on the rear platform of the accommodation train as it pulled out for Summitville.

What happened to the grocer's boy when he got back with his jaded mare is still an unsettled question. Nor did the boy or the people who watched with startled eyes the flight of the gaunt white mare even now know what was the emergency which made the mad chase necessary. There were three cars on the accommodation train to Summitville. In them there were perhaps 30 people all told. A quick canvass of the train proved that not a person on board had even heard of any disturbance at Summitville, which village the train was not due to reach until 10:30 o'clock. By that time of the night it was likely that everybody in town would be sound asleep. To wake them up and wait to get their stories would mean a long delay and probably make it impossible to get a long telegram into the office by midnight. A council of war was held and the three men determined that something must be done to hurry things along.

Finally a telegram was prepared and sent to the mayor of Summitville, asking him if he would be kind enough to meet the train when reached the depot on a matter of great importance connected with the battle of the previous night.

At a station a few miles above Summitville a man got on the train who, on being questioned, proved to know, in a general way, the story of the fight. He told in a graphic way how the bandits had come into the village, only to fall into the ambush which had been carefully prepared for them.

As soon as the staff correspondent had got the leading facts clear in his mind he started to write his story.

"Now," he said, "if the mayor doesn't go back on us, and we get a telegraph wire, we'll pull through all right."

"I'll get a wire of I have to climb a pole and cut one down," said the operator of the party.

At last the poky train came puffing up to the little red station at Summitville. It was several minutes late, but the first glance showed that great excitement prevailed about the station. Right nobly had the mayor of the village responded to the telegraphic appeal which had been sent him.

He stood at one end of the station platform. Next him was the town marshal, wearing a huge star and conscious that he was the hero of the exciting battle of the night before. In the same row were the town aldermen and most of the other dignitaries of the village—men who had been "laying out nights," armed to the teeth, for nearly a week, waiting for the raid which had finally come.

The three men leaped from the train and each rushed to his work. One of the correspondents began with the mayor and went down the line as rapidly as possible, getting his story from each. The other ran into the station and sat down at once to complete the story he had begun on the train. The telegraph operator jumped into the little room where the astonished railroad operator and agent were sitting and took his place at the telegraph instrument. There was no time to be lost.

"Here, gimme hold of that key," said the man from Chicago, and the Hoosier instantly obeyed.

With the speed of an expert he commenced to call Chicago. He wanted to get a wire leading directly into the office of his newspaper. But some one was persistently interrupting. He listened long enough to catch what was wanted.

It was the operator in the office of a rival newspaper which had got wind of the battle at Summitville too late to send down a correspondent.

"Rumor pitched battle in the streets of Summitville," ran the query. "Send good story, 2,500 words, if correct."

The man at the Summitville key smiled viciously, looked around for an instant without saying anything, and then rattled his key fiercely for a moment.

"Say," he said, finally, "the other papers just asked about a pitched battle of some kind down here. I told them they must be mistaken. That everything was quiet and peaceful here to-night. Nothing doing except an ice-cream party up to the parsonage. I asked 'em if they didn't want a good story on that."

"All right," said the staff correspondent, handing over a dozen pages of "copy." "Start that as soon as you can get a loop into the office." A moment later and the story was running into the office as fast as an expert could send it over the wires. The second correspondent had interviewed practically every prominent citizen of the village, and what he had written followed fast on the first. By a few minutes after midnight more than 4,000 words were in the office, and a few minutes later the story had been put into type and was on the presses.

When the operator at Summitville had sent "30" over the wire, which is the telegraphic way of saying "good night," the mayor of Summitville gave further evidence of his desire to be accommodating. He found good sleeping quarters for the Chicago men and invited them to stay over Sunday and take dinner with him.—Chicago Tribune.

Sleepiness of Butterflies.

Butterflies are said to be very sleepy-headed. Twilight sends them to bed, and they are still drowsy at sunrise.

THEY DID NOT ALL SUCCEED.

Efforts to Capture Noted Enemies That Were Not as Successful as Funston's.

Gen. Funston's achievement in capturing Aguinaldo recalls earlier attempts made by officers of other armies to make prisoners of the leaders of hostile forces. The first attempt at seizing a general was never carried out; it involved too many persons, and the plotters engaged in it worked from the inside, not from without, as Funston did, and their plans were overheard. This was the attempt in June, 1777, to seize Washington in New York; the plan was changed later to an attempt to poison him. The plans of the conspirators were overheard by a woman, who disclosed them to the American authorities, and as a result the men implicated were captured and punished, one of them, Private Thomas Hickey, of Washington's bodyguard, being hanged, says the New York Sun.

After Arnold's treason and his flight to the British the Americans made an attempt to seize him. This undertaking was like Gen. Funston's exploit. Sergt. Champe, of Lee's legion, was the principal actor in the scheme. His plan was known only to the chief in command; so when he deserted to the British his late comrades fired upon him and he reached the enemy's lines under a fire of bullets, narrowly escaping with his life. This was an excellent introduction to the British, and Champe was received with open arms. But he was unsuccessful; Arnold moved his headquarters the day on which Champe had arranged to capture him, and Champe had finally to desert from the English and return again, under fire, to our lines. When Washington wished soon after to promote him for his gallantry, he found that Champe had died of disease.

The capture of the British general, Prescott, in July, 1777, was perhaps the first successful attempt of the kind. Gen. Prescott commanded the British forces in Newport, R. I., and went for the summer to a fine house some five miles out of the city. Col. William Barton, knowing this, decided to capture him if possible, and on July 10, 1777, with 41 comrades, rowed across from Warwick point, on the west short of Narragansett bay, and reached the house undiscovered. The door of his house was burst in by a negro, who used his head as a battering ram; Prescott was asleep and awoke to find himself a prisoner. He was not allowed to dress, but in his cloak, with a captor carrying his clothes, was forced to the boat and taken within the American lines and then to Washington's headquarters in New Jersey. He was exchanged later.

The successful capture of Gen. Stoughton by Mosby and his rangers in March, 1863, was the result of a carefully made plan. Mosby, with 29 men, entered Fairfax Courthouse, passing themselves off as belonging to the Fifth New York cavalry, and while some of the band attempted to capture Col. Wyndham, the leader went to the house where the general was sound asleep. At the name of Mosby Gen. Stoughton sat up in bed, wide awake in an instant. "Have you got him?" he asked. "He's got you," replied Mosby. The prisoner was taken to Gen. Fitzhugh Lee's headquarters from the very midst of a camp in which lay several thousand troops. The attempt to capture Sitting Bull was not made by strategy or trick; our Indian scouts went openly to the old chief's tent, and when they tried to arrest the famous Sioux were met with bullets; they returned the fire and killed him, losing some of their number. Funston's capture of Aguinaldo was marked by a well-devised plan, involving more danger than that of any other plot except that of Sergt. Champe's and requiring longer time and more careful work, with the same exception.

Harrison's Courtesy.

"Harrison was always very courteous and honorable in his dealings with the young attorneys on the other side," said one of his associates. "And he was always very kind to the employes in his office. When I first began reading law with him, if he found I had made any error in work for him, he never scolded, but would say: 'How is this, Howard?' and I had my chance given me. If I could say anything for myself, I might say it. Or, if I could show that he was mistaken, it was all right. Then, if it transpired that the fault was mine, all he would say would be: 'Fix it.' I have seen him very indignant over injustice done his clients, but I never saw him angry, or lose his temper, or get out of fix; and that is a great thing to say when I have known him for 34 years."—Christian Endeavor World.

Why Dinah Felt So Bad.

Not long ago a lieutenant in the navy was ordered away on a three years' cruise. The order had been dreaded for weeks, and when it came the young wife, who was to be left in a Brooklyn flat with a baby and a colored servant, was in despair.

She controlled her sorrow very well, however, until the actual moment of parting came, and then she wept as though her heart would break. The cruiser was to leave the navy yard early next morning, and the lieutenant had gone to report for duty.

In the midst of her lamentations the young wife heard a sniffling and sobbing in the dining-room, and upon glancing through the door she saw Dinah, the colored maid, rocking her body to and fro in a chair and weeping violently.

"Why, D-D-Dinah, what's the m-matter?" cried the mistress; "you seem to t-t-take Mr. Blank's departure as much to heart as I d-do."

"'Deed I doesn't, Mis' Blank; 'deed I doesn't!" sobbed Dinah. "What am boderin' dis chile am de fac' dat a cullud gemman friend o' mine am gwine sail hisse'f on dat same ole cruisah!"

His Trip Awheel.

A devotee of the bicycle started southward on his wheel at the beginning of winter. Several weeks afterward he reached Florida none the worse for his journey.

"Do you mean to tell me," exclaimed the friend whom he had gone to visit, "that you made the whole distance by wheel?"

"Certainly," he replied. "When I couldn't ride the machine I got off and walked by it."

The reader will perceive that there is more than one way to travel "by wheel."—Youth's Companion.

Easy Fishing in Oregon.

Those who like to see immense schools of fish, most of them weighing from two to six pounds each, ought to be here. Five minutes' walk from Main street brings one to the shores of Klamath rapids, where every little nook, bay and tributary creek is so crowded with mullets that their backs stick out of the water. Ordinary fishing with hooks, spears or even nets is too slow to think of. With a pitchfork or with the naked hands a backload may be thrown out in five minutes.—Klamath Republican.

Persistency of the Flavor.

A western correspondent sends us this story, which may be taken with a few grains of salt as to the material allegation contained therein:

A country customer had bought some fish at a village grocery store—whether codfish, mackerel or herring is not necessary for the purposes of the story—and at her next visit to the store she entered a complaint.

"They tasted," she objected, "exactly like English breakfast tea."

"I'm not surprised, ma'am," replied the grocer. "Those fish were caught in Boston harbor."—N. Y. Sun.

PERIODS OF PAIN.

How Three Women Found Relief.

While no woman is entirely free from periodical suffering, it does not seem to have been the plan of nature that woman should suffer so severely. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the most thorough female regulator known to medical science. It relieves the condition which produces so much discomfort and robs menstruation of its terrors.

The three letters here published should encourage every woman who suffers:

Aug. 6, 1898.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I have suffered since the age of sixteen with painful menstruation. I have been treated for months, and was told that the womb had fallen a little. The doctor says that is now in place again, but I still have the same pain. Please tell me what to do."—MRS. EMMA KUEHL, 112 Trautman St., Brooklyn, E. D., N.Y.

Jan. 10, 1899.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—After receiving your reply to my letter of Aug. 6 I followed your kind advice, and am glad to tell you that I have been cured of the severe pain at time of menstruation through the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I have taken six bottles of it, felt better after the first bottle, and after a while had no more pain or womb trouble.

"I had doctored from the age of sixteen to twenty-six, and had lost all hope, but your medicine has made me well.

"I would like to have you use my testimonial, so that others may see, and be inspired with hope, and take your medicine."—MRS. EMMA KUEHL, 112 Trautman St., Brooklyn, E. D., N.Y.

Feb. 20, 1900.

"I saw your medicine so highly recommended I thought I would write to you for advice.

"My menstruation occurs every two weeks, lasts a week, and is painful. I have been troubled in this way for some time. I suffer from sick headache and backache all the time, appetite poor, sick at stomach every morning, everything I eat hurts me, am very weak, thin, and sallow.

"I have tried a doctor, but he did not seem to do me any good."—MISS MAGGIE POLLARD, 319 So. 4th St., Richmond, Va.

April 23, 1900.

"Since receiving your answer to my letter I have been taking your Vegetable Compound, and it has done me more good than any medicine I have ever taken. My menses are all right now, and appear once a month, and I feel so much stronger. I shall always praise your medicine."—MISS MAGGIE POLLARD, 319 So. 4th St., Richmond, Va.

"I was troubled with female weakness, irregular and painful menstruation, and leucorrhoea. The doctor's medicine did me no good. I have taken one bottle and a half of your Vegetable Compound, and thanks to your medicine, my pains are gone. I advise all women suffering as I have to use your Vegetable Compound."—EMMA J. PRIBBLE, Indianola, Ill.

If there is anything about your case about which you would like special advice, write freely to Mrs. Pinkham. No man will see your letter. She can surely help you, for no person in America has such a wide experience in treating female ills as she has had. She has helped hundreds of thousands of women back to health. Her address is Lynn, Mass., and her advice is free. You are very foolish if you do not accept her kind invitation.

$5000 REWARD.—We have deposited with the National City Bank of Lynn, $5000, which will be paid to any person who can find that the above testimonial letters are not genuine, or were published before obtaining the writer's special permission. LYDIA E. PINKHAM MEDICINE CO.

SYMPHONY IN BLUE AND GRAY.

GRAY skies hung o'er our land in '61, blue garbs below,
Where battle's tempests hurled men to and fro;
While sometimes on the ground lay garbs of gray,
The blue o'erhead in skies where sunbeams play;
But whether blue or gray arched overhead,
Or were on warring hosts below outspread,
They mingled where lay stilled in peace the dead.

Sometimes the gray crept o'er a dying face,
Sometimes the blue 'neath closed eyes left its trace,
And little cared the anguished wearers then
What garb hid hearts of torn and mangled men,
Who brave and dauntless, when they reached the brink
Of that dread tide from which the strongest shrink,
Quaffed deep Death's flagon from which all must drink.

And prospects then were sometimes Heaven's own blue,
Sometimes deep gray amid which shadows grew;
Blue in both flags, and bars of deepest red
Like streams which ran where thickest lay the dead;
Gray shadows fell on countless hearts and lives,
On orphaned children, patient, waiting wives,
And such strong grief as Hope's foundation rives.

And now both north and south 'mid peace to-day
There mingle once again the blue and gray—
Gray in the tattered flags, in beard and hair,
Blue in the skies, true eyes and new flags there;
While over all reigns glad and radiant peace,
The banner of the stars, hope's rich increase,
Fraternity no more to fail or cease.

God bless the hosts both north and south who now
Renew in brotherhood their patriot vow,
Who everywhere spread flowers above their dead
Without one word of hate or treason said;
One flag, one country, one true patriot way,
One band in love and loyalty are they;
God bless the boys in blue, the boys in gray.

I. EDGAR JONES.

The REMEMBERED GRAVE.

"I GUESS there won't be a great show of flowers on Sylvester's grave this year," said Sarah Cook. Her voice had a certain triumph in it, but it ended with a decorous sigh.

"I guess there won't, either," returned her sister, Mrs. Kemp. "I guess Phebe Ann is too sick to think much about it." Her voice sounded like Sarah's.

Lucy Kemp dropped her sewing for a minute, and turned her face toward the window. "It seems 'most too bad, don't it?" she said, meditatively. "When she's done so much every year, and thought so much about it."

"I don't know as I think it's too bad," said Mrs. Kemp. "Of course I'm sorry Phebe Ann is sick, but when it comes to these flowers she's always covered Sylvester's grave with. Decoration day, I guess there was a great deal of it for show. It would have seemed different if he had been in the war, but I've thought a good many times, when I've seen Sylvester's grave with more flowers on it than any of the soldiers, that Phebe Ann had a little eye to what folks would say, for all she felt so bad."

"I don't care anything about the show," said Sarah Cook, "but I do think such an outlay on flowers to put on a grave is wicked, when there's folks that's her own kith and kin in actual want. It's as much as 20 years since Sylvester Kemp died, and there ain't been a year that Phebe Ann ain't laid out dollars on flowers. I guess if we'd had the dollars right here, it would have been more to her credit!"

"Well, I ain't never complained nor begged," rejoined Mrs. Kemp. "Nobody can say I have, whatever happens. There's the rent money due, and that new dressmaker has come to town, and the work's falling off, and I don't know what's goin' to become of us, but I ain't complained nor begged."

"There's the band!" cried Lucy.

It was a very warm day for the season—almost as warm as midsummer. The windows were wide open. The two women and the girl leaned their heads out and listened. They could hear far-away music. Two little girls, with their hands full of flowers, ran past.

"They're just forming down at the town hall," said Lucy. "Annie Dole and Lottie are just going."

"They came over here for flowers this morning," said her mother, "and I told 'em I hadn't any to give. All I had was lilacs, besides that little early rose bush, and they'd got all the lilacs they wanted of their own, and there was only just three roses on that bush, and I could not bear to cut 'em. The procession ain't coming—the music don't sound a mite nearer. It won't be here for an hour yet."

The three seated themselves and fell to sewing again. The two older women swung out their long arms with stern persistency. Their faces were harsh and sad, and had a similarity of feature as well as expression. Lucy, the young girl, bent weakly over her work. The room was full of the faint band music and the perfume of lilacs. She wished in her heart that she could put on her best dress and go out with the other girls, but she said nothing. They sat in the kitchen. The floor was swept clean, and there was no fire in the polished cooking stove; it was early in the afternoon. Presently Lucy looked up. "Mother," said she, "cain't I stop sewing and run outdoors a minute?"

"Where do you want to go?"

"Just outdoors a minute."

Lucy was 17, but she seemed like a child in her manner toward her mother.

"I don't care," said Mrs. Kemp.

"I s'pose the child gets dreadful tired sewing the whole time," she said to her sister, after Lucy had gone out. "Sometimes I feel kind of worried about her."

"She won't get tired sewing much longer, nor we, neither, if we don't have more work come in," retorted her sister, grimly. "We ain't got a mite ahead. We've got to go on the town, for all I see." She said "town" with a scornful fear, as if it were an enemy to whom she must surrender.

"I don't s'pose Phebe Ann's husband will lift his finger to help us, even if she should be taken away, and he left without a chick nor child in the world," said Mrs. Kemp.

Phebe Ann's husband was her own dead husband's brother, but she never spoke of him by his own name.

"I wonder how much Phebe Ann's husband has got?" said Sarah Cook.

"Well, I guess he's laid by a little something. They must have, with no family!"

"Mebbe he will do something, if it ever happens that he ain't under anybody else's thumb."

"It won't make any difference now. He's laid under the thumb so long that he's all flattened out of the shape he was made in. He used to bow kind of sideways behind Phebe Ann's back, when I met him, but he don't do that now. I met him face to face the other day, and he never looked at me. I don't know what poor Thomas would say if he was alive. I wonder what Lucy is picking lilacs for? Lucy!"

"What say?" Lucy's sweet, thin voice called back. Her smooth, fair head was half hidden in a great clump of lilac bushes by the gate. She was bending the branches over, and breaking off full purple clusters.

"What you picking those lilacs for?"

"I just thought I'd pick a few."

"What for? I ain't going to have any in the house! They're too sweet—they're sickish!"

"DO YOU KNOW WHO PUT THOSE FLOWERS THERE?"

"I ain't going to bring them into the house," said Lucy. She let a branch fly back, and went across the yard with a great bunch of lilacs in her hands.

"I wonder what she's up to?" said her mother.

Lucy returned just before the procession passed. The cemetery was a little way beyond the house. Her mother and aunt, and a neighbor who had come in, stood at the windows listening eagerly to the approaching music. Lucy joined them. The procession filed slowly past, the Grand Army men, the village band, the ministers and local dignitaries, and the rear guard of children with flowers. An accompanying crowd thronged the sidewalks.

"I've just been saying to Sarah that Phebe Ann won't have Sylvester's grave decked out much this year," said Mrs. Kemp. Her voice was pleasanter and more guarded than before.

"I heard Phebe Ann was pretty low," said the neighbor.

"Yes, I s'pose she is. I should have gone up there, but she ain't been inside this house for ten years, and I ain't going to push in where I ain't wanted. I hear she's got Mis' Baker with her, so she's taken care of. I couldn't help thinking this morning how much she'd always laid out on Sylvester's grave. Well, mebbe 'twas a comfort to her. I ain't never thought so much of anything of that kind, because my husband and all my folks are buried away from here, and I ain't had any chance to do anything about their graves. Ain't that Phebe Ann's husband now? That looks like his horse."

"Yes, 'tis," said Sarah Cook.

"I've a great mind to run to the door and inquire how she is!" cried the neighbor, excitedly.

"Why don't you?" said Mrs. Kemp.

The neighbor ran to the door and called out. She was a stout woman with a shrill voice.

"How is—Phebe—Ann?" she clamored.

The horse was pulled up, and an old man's face peered around the buggy wing. "How is Phebe Ann this afternoon?" the woman said again. Mrs. Kemp, Sarah Cook and Lucy were listening at her back.

"Sinking," replied the old man, in a hoarse voice. Then he drove on. The woman called something else after him, but he paid no attention. He had to pass the cemetery, which was now thronged with the living, in bright groups, standing among the flower-strewn graves of the dead. The music had ceased. A man's voice sounded out loudly in the hush. Phebe Ann's husband, John Kemp, leaned forward and shook the reins over his horse, then drove past rapidly. He kept his face turned away from the cemetery, and his forehead was scowling distressfully.

He had a half-mile to go before he reached home. He left the horse in the yard and went into the house on tiptoe, through the house to Phebe Ann's bedroom. As he peered in stealthily, the nurse, who was sitting beside the bed, looked up and put her finger to her lip. There was just a glimpse of a pale, sharp profile among the pillows. Phebe Ann was asleep on her journey to the grave.

Her husband went out, put up his horse, and sat down on the doorstep. He looked idly out over the fields. After awhile he heard the village band again. It sounded quite near. They were marching back from the cemetery. Suddenly the old man felt a hand on his shoulder. "She's waked up," the nurse whispered, "and she's terrible worked up about its being Decoration day. You'd better come in."

Phebe Ann's husband went softly behind the nurse to the bedroom. Phebe Ann looked up at him and beckoned imperatively. He went close and bent over her. "What is it, Phebe Ann?" said he.

"Is it—Decoration day?" she whispered, with difficulty, for she was growing very weak.

"Yes, 'tis, Phebe Ann," said her husband.

"Have you got—any flowers for—Sylvester's grave?"

"No, I ain't. I ain't thought of it, Phebe Ann, with your being so sick, and all."

"Go—get some!" she panted. Her motioning hand and her eager eyes spoke louder than her tongue.

"Yes, I will, I will, Phebe Ann! Don't you fret another mite about it."

The nurse followed him out of the room.

"I can't go to the greenhouse," he whispered, agitatedly. "It's five miles away."

"Land, get any kind of flowers!" said the nurse. "Get dandelions, and buttercups, if you can't find anything else."

The old man took his hat down with a bewildered air, and went slowly out of the yard. At the gate he paused and looked around. There were no flowers in the yard; there were several bushes, rose and phlox, but it was too early for them to blossom. Over at the left stretched a field, and that was waving with green and gold. Phebe Ann's husband went over into the field and began pulling the buttercups in great handfuls, and the grasses with them. He had all he could carry when he left the field, and went solemnly down the road.

Sylvester's grave was at the farther side of the cemetery. The old man, with his load of buttercups and grass, made his way to it. The soldiers' graves were decorated with flags and flowers, but the people had gone. The cemetery was very still. When John Kemp reached Sylvester's grave he started and stared. There was a great bunch of lilacs on the grave, and three charming, delicate pink roses in a vase.

"I wonder who put those flowers there!" he muttered. He laid the buttercups and grass down on the grave; then he stood still. It was over 20 years since the boy Sylvester had been laid there—a little soldier who had fought only his own pain. "I wonder who put those flowers there!" John Kemp muttered again.

He went out of the cemetery, but instead of turning down the road toward his own home, walked hesitatingly the other way toward the house of his sister-in-law—Thomas' wife, as he always spoke of her.

Lucy's face was at one open window, her Aunt Sarah Cook's at the other.

"Lucy!" called the old man, standing at the gate.

Lucy came out to him tremblingly. Sarah Cook ran to tell her sister; she thought Phebe Ann must be dead.

"Do you know who put those flowers there?" asked the old man, in a husky voice.

"I did," said Lucy. Her face flushed. "I thought there wouldn't be anybody to see to it, now Aunt Phebe Ann is sick," she explained, timidly.

Her uncle looked wistfully at her, his eyes full of tears. "Sylvester was a dreadful sufferer," he said.

Lucy did not know what to say. She looked up at him, and her soft face seemed to take on distressed lines like his.

The old man turned abruptly and went away. "Phebe Ann is sinking," he said, indistinctly, as he went.

Lucy's mother and her aunt rushed to the door to meet her. "Is Phebe Ann dead?" Sarah Cook called out.

"No, she ain't dead."

"What did he want to see you for?" asked Mrs. Kemp.

Lucy hesitated; a shamefaced look came over her face. "What did he want?" her mother asked, imperatively.

"He wanted to know who put some flowers on—Sylvester's grave."

"Did you?"

"Yes'm."

"What did you put on?"

"Some lilacs and—roses."

"You didn't pick those roses?"

"Oh, mother, the lilacs didn't seem quite enough! Aunt Phebe Ann has always done so much!" Lucy said. She was almost crying.

Her mother and her aunt looked at each other. "I shouldn't have thought you'd have picked those roses without saying anything about it," said her mother, but her voice was embarrassed rather than harsh. She went back to the kitchen and proceeded with her work of making biscuits for supper. The sewing was all finished. Lucy set the table. After supper they went out in the cemetery, and strolled about looking at the flowers, in the soft, low light. "Who brought all that mess of buttercups and grass, I wonder?" said Sarah Cook, as they stood over Sylvester's grave.

"I guess it must have been Phebe Ann's husband—it looks like a man," Mrs. Kemp replied. Lucy got down on her knees and straightened the buttercups into a bouquet.

"I wonder if she'll live the night out," said Sarah Cook, soberly.

"I've listened to hear the bell toll every morning this week," said Mrs. Kemp. "I don't believe she can live much longer. I'd go up there to-night, if I thought she wanted me to."

The next morning Mrs. Kemp, listening with her head thrust out of the window in the early sunlight, heard indeed the bell tolling for Phebe Ann. "She's gone," she told Sarah Cook and Lucy; and Lucy cried.

They all went to Phebe Ann's funeral and followed her to the grave. Mrs. Kemp's and Sarah Cook's eyes were red when they came home. "There were a great many good things about Phebe Ann, after all," Mrs. Kemp said.

"I always said there was," Sarah returned, defiantly.

The morning after the funeral John Kemp came to the door. Lucy answered his knock. He looked old and dejected, but he tried to smile. "I want to see you a minute," said he. "No, I can't come in—not this morning. I'm coming before long. I hope things will be different from what they have been. It was her wish. I went home that day and told Phebe Ann how you'd put the flowers there, and she beckoned to me to come and lean over her. Then she made out to tell me. She wanted you to have Sylvester's money that we put in the bank for him when he was born. It's been growing. We haven't spent any, excepting for flowers, and it's near $500. She wanted me to give it to you right away, and you're going to have it just as soon as I can get it out of the bank. Phebe Ann said you could have some more schooling, and not have to work so hard. And I guess you'll have more than that, too, some day, if you outlive me. Phebe Ann, she thought mebbe I could make some arrangements with your mother and aunt to come to our house and live, and take care of it. She said she didn't want any other women in there. She knew they were good housekeepers, and would keep things the way she did. You tell your mother I'm coming in to see her some time before long."

John Kemp went feebly down the walk, and Lucy returned to the kitchen. The door had been ajar, and her mother and Sarah Cook had heard every word. They were both crying. "Coming just now when we didn't know which way to turn!" sobbed Sarah Cook. "Poor Phebe Ann!"

"Well, there's one thing about it," said Mrs. Kemp, brokenly, "there sha'n't one Decoration day go by as long as I live, without Sylvester's grave being trimmed as handsome as if his mother was alive!"—Mary E. Wilkins, in Youth's Companion.

Reminder of a New Life.

Memorial day, coming as it does at the close of the most beautiful of spring months, when buds and blossoms appear after the barrenness and desolation of winter, can but remind us of that brighter future when a new life shall arise from the desolation of the grave, and when we shall meet our comrades and our friends where there shall be no more wars, no more wounds or disease, and no more sorrow or partings.—Boston Budget

SOUTHERN HAWK TRAP.

Tennessee Poultryman Describes a Device That Is Based on Common-Sense Principles.

In this part of the country I find in use an ingenious and very effective hawk trap. It consists of an ordinary steel trap, not too large, mounted on the top of a common fence rail or a long pole, set firmly in the ground. It is best located on some moderately high point in the middle of a wide field, where there are no trees or other objects upon which a bird may light. No bait is needed. The trap is simply opened on top of the pole, where the bird sets it off and is caught in the act of alighting, a. Of course the trap must be firmly secured to the pole. The device is based on the principle that birds of prey habitually light on prominent objects in large open spaces, where they will have a good outlook for game. A trap well placed will, during one season, catch all the hawks within a radius of several miles. Owls and other large birds are also frequently found in the trap. The longer and the more substantial the pole, the better it is.—Orange Judd Farmer.

ABOUT YOUNG TURKEYS.

Should Be Forced Forward as Much as Possible Immediately After the Hatching.

For the first food give some finely cut onion-tops mixed with hard-boiled eggs, and crushed wheat or breadcrumbs. Finely chopped onion-tops are always relished. The young turkeys are keen on picking out from their diet those articles which they most prefer. Stale bread and curds are accepted. Dampness, whether from rain, dew or from any other cause, is fatal to very young turkeys. In a few weeks the diet may consist mostly of grain and a variety. In addition it is a good plan to tie up a vegetable of some sort just so high that the birds must stand well up to pick at it. This is good food, and the exercise is beneficial. Where grain is grown the birds as they come on should be given the run of the stubble-fields, where they will pick up much food for themselves. A point in feeding young turkeys is to give them food four or five times a day—all they will eat—but clean away that which is uneaten, as it may ferment and injure them. A little millet-seed may be scattered for them to seek, and they may be turned out with the hen from nine o'clock in the morning until five in the afternoon, but must not be allowed among other lots of turkeys or chicks, in order to avoid lice. The large lice on the heads come from the hen turkey and quickly destroy the young ones. Dust them with insect-powder, and rub it on their heads. Hatch the first eggs under (chicken) hens.—Farm and Fireside.

Dampness Causes Many Ills.

Protection from dampness is of the greatest importance. More injury comes to chicks from dampness than from all else besides. If they can find a dry spot for their feet during the day and a warm, dry place to stay in at night, they will do fairly well, even during a long wet period, after they are three or four weeks old. Small chicks suffer very much during wet weather, and should be protected from both wet and dampness. Cold and dampness produce colds and bowel trouble, either of which is very disastrous to a brood of chicks. During wet weather it is not amiss to tie a small piece of gum camphor with a small stone in a piece of cloth, and put in their drinking water. It is one of the best simple remedies for colds.—Country Gentleman.

Teaching Chickens to Roost.

The best method to follow for the smaller breeds is to teach them to go upon a roost as soon as they are old enough. Place a roost in their coop as soon as they are old enough to leave the hen or brooder, so that they will learn the habit of roosting, as it keeps their legs in better shape as to smoothness and color. This will not do so well for larger fowls, as they are so heavy and clumsy that it is not of benefit to them, for the reason that it often bends their breastbone out of shape. The best plan for them during the summer is in open sheds upon clean sand, protected from all roving animals by wire cloth fronts to the sheds. These sheds or runs should be cleaned up every morning and raked over so as to keep them clean and sweet.—Country Gentleman.

A FAMOUS OLD HOUSE.

The house of Walter Baker & Co., whose manufactures of cocoa and chocolate have become familiar in the mouth as household words, was established one hundred and twenty-one years ago (1780) on the Neponset River in the old town of Dorchester, a suburb of Boston. From the little wooden mill, "by the rude bridge that arched the flood," where the enterprise was first started, there has grown up the largest industrial establishment of the kind in the world. It might be said that, while other manufacturers come and go, Walter Baker & Co. go on forever.

What is the secret of their great success? It is a very simple one. They have won and held the confidence of the great and constantly increasing body of consumers by always maintaining the highest standard in the quality of their cocoa and chocolate preparations, and selling them at the lowest price for which unadulterated articles of good quality can be put upon the market. They welcome honest competition; but they feel justified in denouncing in the strongest terms the fraudulent methods by which inferior preparations are palmed off on customers who ask for and suppose they are getting the genuine articles. The best grocers refuse to handle such goods, not alone for the reason that, in the long run, it doesn't pay to do it, but because their sense of fair dealing will not permit them to aid in the sale of goods that defraud their customers and injure honest manufacturers.

Every package of the goods made by the Walter Baker Company bears the well-known trade-mark "La Belle Chocolatiere," and their place of manufacture "Dorchester, Mass." Housekeepers are advised to examine their purchases, and make sure that other goods have not been substituted.

An attractive little book of "Choice Recipes" will be mailed free to any housekeeper who sends her name and address to Walter Baker & Co., Ltd., 158 State Street, Boston, Mass.

Of Mixed Nationality.

The usual humorous incidents were not lacking in the recently taken British census. An emigrant in New Zealand stated to the authorities that his mother was a Kaffir, his father an Irishman who had become a naturalized American, but afterward served in the French army, and that he himself was born on the passage between Yokohama and Colombo in a Spanish vessel. "Put him down a Scotchman!" was the official decision.—Chicago Chronicle.

WHAT WE HEAR FROM ASSINIBOIA, WESTERN CANADA.

"Don't Think of Coming, But Come."

To the Editor:

The above is the emphatic manner in which a friend in Yorkton writes to a friend near St. Paul, Minnesota, and it is pretty nearly right, too, when the advantages that Western Canada offer to those seeking homes. The Assiniboia district is one of the best. The writer from whose letter we quote goes on to say:

"John, if you miss this chance you are foolish, for you can get out cheaper when there are so many coming, and I would not tell you to come if I thought you could not do well, and if you don't come in the spring you will have to go away back, for you do not want to think that there is no one living out here but us. I saw nicer buildings out here than I ever saw before, and if the country was no good what would they want them for? John, if you sold everything you have and come out here you would be worth more than ever you were before, and if you can bring your team, you can get anything you want on tick, and when they do that with strangers they are not afraid they can't make enough to pay for it. I saw as nice wheat as I ever saw in my life and if they could not grow grain what would the flour mill be for, and it cost $20,000."

Now this was what Mr. Thomas Fitzpatrick, of Yorkton, Assiniboia, Western Canada, wrote to a friend.

There will be opened up this summer new districts in Saskatchewan and Assiniboia, at low prices, particulars of which can be had of any agent of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, whose advertisement appears elsewhere in the columns of your paper.

FOR SHERIFF.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the nomination of Sheriff for Garrett county, subject to the decision of the Republican Nominating Convention, and solicit the support of Republicans throughout the county.
Dist. No. 7. ANDREW SHARTZER.

FOR SHERIFF.

Newspaper Frauds.

"Non-partisan" papers, edited by partisans, are the most patent humbugs of the age. In commenting upon public matters they start out non-partisan, but wind up partisan. They are simply frauds. A partisan paper is the more to be admired. It sacrafices patronage for principle. It is more honest, for it does not play for both sides, and does not pretend to be anything than partisan. There is nothing antagonistic to honesty in being partisan, and there is every inducement to dishonesty in being non-partisan or independent. The most despicable object is a partisan who pretends to conduct a non-partisan or independent paper, and then by his acts endorses every principle and policy which his party espouses.—Westminster (Md.) Advocate.

Our Dead.

To-day will be generally observed as a National holiday, having been set aside as "Memorial Day," when the graves of those who have fallen upon our battle fields, or in defense of our flag in far distant lands, will be strewn with flowers and eloquent, appropriate and graceful tributes will be paid their memory.

"Blue an' the gray together, dreamin' the last long dream,
The peace o' God smiles o'er the sod where the snow-white lillies gleam.
* * * * * *
The gray has long since faded—faded just like the blue—
Each has a part in the home-folks' heart an' the heart of the Nation, too.
Blue and the gray together, under the home-blooms fair,
An' the home-folks' love is rich above, in the flowers clustered there."

So universal has become the recognition of this day, and so tender and touching the tributes to those who have fallen asleep by the wayside, at the post of danger, in the broad glare of the open day, or as the gold of evening meets the dusk of night under the silent stars, that not even the neglected corner of the village or country church yard is overlooked—that does not bear some evidence of love—for love is the golden thread that holds us fast to the grass covered mound.

It is a sacred and hallowed custom—it touches every home whether jeweled with love or sad and deep with the waves of adversity—for however dark the night,' "hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing."

It comes, too, midst the poetic beauty of the softest and sweet season of the year—the blue birds are whispering their most delicate notes, and eager breezes are kissing every vine and flower—with color, form and music everywhere blending.

Beautiful custom, no birdling's song, no flowers' perfumed breath can be sweeter, and no sunset cloud nor line of life can be purer than the example or the memories which thou awakeneth.

It was a heathen poet, be believe, who said:

"In the halls that our feast illume,
The rose for one hour may bloom,
But the cypress that grows round the tomb,
Ah! the cypress is green forever."

Field Attacks Gorman.

S. S. Field, the Maryland silver leader and champion of William J. Bryan, is out with an authorized interview in which he declares that the result of the recent election in Baltimore means that the Democratic party cannot win this fall with ex-Senator Gorman as its candidate for the United States Senate. He reviews the various reverses the party has sustained in the State since 1895, the only victory being when Gorman was not a factor, and then goes on to say:

"The people of Baltimore will not, in 1901, vote to re-establish the identical bossism in the person of the same individual leaders which they voted to overthrow in 1895. And as goes Baltimore so goes Maryland. There is not in recent years a single instance in which the State and city have failed to vote the same way. Always both have gone Democratic or both Republican, and if we want to make an exception to the rule this year we must remove the cause that operated in 1895, in 1897, and in the recent election."

Referring to the recent Presidential election, when Mr. Gorman was reported sick he goes on to say: "It was unfortunate that he should have contracted a severe cold just in time to prevent his appearance at the big music hall meeting, at which he had been advertised to open the campaign for Bryan and which had been gotten up especially for him and that this cold should have incapacitated him during the whole campaign when he was so anxious to take off his coat and work for the nominee, as he had previously in several interviews declared he intended to do.

"Three times has Mr. Gorman been beaten in Baltimore, and there is a fatality in three successive defeats. The most expert swimmer is beyond the succor of the rescue crew when he has sunk the third time. The third stroke of paralysis is fatal. Mr. Gorman's day has passed. Let his friends bow to the verdict of the people thrice expressed; let them not insist on again sacrificing the whole party in the hopeless effort to enthrone him."

What Republicanism Has Done.

Twenty-five years ago the United States was in the middle of a five years' period of serious industrial and commercial stagnation, beginning with the convulsion of 1873. Yet in this quarter of a century this country has very nearly trippled the annual value of its exports of merchandise. What has caused this splendid transformation? Republican policy chiefly. In 1875 the Republican party, in the face of the solid opposition of the Democracy, put upon the national statute book the act under which specie payments were resumed on January 1, 1879, and all the country's currency was brought up to the gold level, and has been held up to that line ever since. By a wise series of Tariff acts the Republicans have built up an industrial system which is the envy of all the other countries, and which is now making conquests in all the markets of the world. The Republican party has established the gold standard, thus ending the Democratic panic of 1893; has given the United States the best financial system in the world, and has brought a degree of prosperity and stability to the country such as was never equaled in the past, even in the United States. The trippling of America's list of exports in the past twenty-five years, coupled with the rest of the industrial and financial triumphs which the country has gained, form a magnificent tribute to the intelligence, foresight and courage of the Republican party.

Asks Leave To Visit America.

The fallen dictator of the Philippines, repentant of his folly, and more or less appreciative of the beneficient rule which the United States government is seeking to establish in the Philippine archipelago, has besought Gen. MacArthur to obtain for him the consent of our government to grant him freedom from custody and permit him, in the company of two delegates, to visit this country.

Aguinaldo's expressed purpose is a laudable one, in that he desires to study the manners, customs and mode of living of the American people, and to acquire such other information dealing with the solution of social and economic problems the affairs of state, etc., as will benefit his country and himself. It would seem that his spirit of arrogance, born of self conceit and ignorance of the inexhaustible resources of this country had been subdued and that the light of wisdom was about to break in upon him. By his oath of allegiance he is in duty bound to eradicate the last trace of rebellion, and if he honestly purposes to better the interests of his people, his request is entitled to earnest consideration.

Bryan and the Democracy.

From the pertinacity with which he declares his loyalty to his own principles one would suppose that Mr. Bryan had been accused of deserting the Democracy he succeeded in twice leading to ignominious defeat. We are not aware that anyone has leveled such a charge at the Nebraskan. Rather are we inclined to the belief that long before he leaves the Democratic party it will have cast him out, bag and baggage. The drift is unmistakably in that direction, and it now seems that nothing can save the erstwhile candidate from complete obliteration as a party leader. In the current number of his paper the Commoner, Mr. Bryan speaks in a lofty vein of his devotion to the fallacious principles advocated by him through two disastrous presidential campaigns. That devotion has not been impugned, and we accept Mr. Bryan's words at their full face value. But when he says: "The Democratic party can better afford to appeal to the conscience of the people, even though it remains out of power, than to enjoy power at the expense of its principles," there may be some difference of opinion as to what Mr. Bryan means.

This sentiment is a praiseworthy one; the objection to it rises from as to the principles Mr. Bryan advocates. The principles of Mr. Bryan are of one kind; those of the Democratic party are of another. The former were made by Mr. Bryan, forced upon the Democratic party, and have twice been repudiated by the people as unsafe, revolutionary and highly undesirable. Had the editor of the Commoner declared that he would rather remain out of power than sacrifice his principles no objection could have been raised, since principle is a matter of personal conviction, and every man is to be admired for standing by what he believes to be right. But Mr. Bryan makes the mistake of assuming that his principles are those of the Democratic party. The true Democratic principles are the products of years of careful thought, national policy and the developments and evolutions of statesmanship.

The real Democracy recognizes the error of which it was guilty when it surrendered to the Bryanites at Chicago, and it is struggling with all its force to return to its former allegiances. In all parts of the country men of commanding prominence in the Democratic camp are giving up the ghost of Bryanism. The former leaders are returning to the command and the tide is flowing against Mr. Bryan with irresistable force. In the face of all this, it is specious for the Nebraskan to talk about unswerving loyalty to his species of Democratic principle. If Mr. Bryan desires and intends to follow these fallacies, that is his own business; but henceforth the Democratic party will appeal in behalf of principles which do not breed riot, revolution, repudiation, sinister class hatreds, and all other things which have no place in this great republic.

Learn to Vote.

The intervening months between now and election should be fully utilized by the illiterate voter to become familiar with the new ballot law, which, in mild terms is an abomination and well constituted to serve the purpose of the Democratic machine, i. e. to disfranchise about 40,000 voters. No detail of the ballot, however small, is too unimportant to be overlooked as every opportunity to throw out a Republican vote will be utilized. The election this fall will be a general one, there being two State officers to be elected, viz: Comptroller of the Treasury and Clerk to the Court of Appeals. In addition to these the county officers are to be elected.

SHORT RUN.

We are blessed with plenty of rain and the farmers are doing almost nothing at this time on account of wet weather.

Mr. D. R. Harvey is recovering from another bad attack of rheumatism.

Mrs. S. C. Harvey lost her her very valuable dog "Ring" last week. He was the favorite dog of the neighborhood, but Scott by accident fell a tree on him.

Mr. Lee Uphole was thrown but not dangerously hurt by a wild colt last week.

R. Cosner, of Blaine, has moved his saw mill on Short Run, where he expects to spend the summer.

Alex. Wilson is improving slowly. We hope to see him out soon.

George Harvey has just returned from Oakland. He is all smiles.

Milo Wilson says of all the drinks he ever tried the best is in D. R. Harvey's well.

Abe Bray was a visitor at James Wilson's last week.

R. M. Uphole is still pulling the string on the Rocky Mountain goats.

BEE BIRD.

Vegetable Seeds Exhausted.

We have had numerous calls for vegetable seeds within the past few days which has entirely exhausted the supply sent by Senator Wellington.

Two New Postoffices.

During the past week two new postoffices have been established in this county—Guard, near Guard's store in District No. 2, and Merrill, at Judge Elias Merrill's farm in District No. 11. At the latter office the postmaster will be a daughter of Judge Merrill. The name of the postmaster at Guard we have not learned.

Will Meet at Deer Park.

The executive council of the State Bar Association held a meeting last Friday in Baltimore and made arrangements for the annual meeting which will be held this year at Deer Park on July 31.

WANTS TO COME HERE.

Aguinaldo Asks Permission to Visit the United States.

Aguinaldo has expressed a preference to Gen. McArthur, commander of the American forces in the Philippines, to come to America, asking that this privilege be granted that he may depart for the United States about September 1st, since he expresses the belief that at this time the conditions in the Philippines will have so far improved as to admit of his release from custody.

It is his avowed intention to make a careful study of American institutions, to more fully familiarize himself with the English language, to investigate social and economical problems and acquire such information as will benefit himself and countrymen. He further asks that two delegates be allowed to accompany him for the same purpose. Aguinaldo's request has been referred to the authorities at Washington.

BLOOMINGTON.

Messrs. George Warnick and John Miller attended the funeral of their cousin, Fireman Crutchley, at Cumberland on last Saturday afternoon. Mr. Crutchley was a son-in-law of ex-Sheriff Samuel Warnick, of Allegany county, and was killed on Thursday near Weston, W. Va., by his engine running into a landslide and down an embankment. The young man was terribly mashed about the body and nearly cut in two and in this condition lived in great agony and at times conscious for five hours. He leaves a widow but no children.

Mr. Truman Warnick started for the Pan-American Exposition Tuesday morning. He expects to make a few stops on the way before he sings "Pat me off at Buffalo." He intends to spend most of the summer at the Exposition and has a position in view during his visit. He will lie flat on his stomach and take a good old fashioned country drink from Niagara Falls before going over into Canada to be introduced to "Johnny Bull."

Mrs. Thornton Wilt, of Frankville, was a visitor of Mrs. James Coffman during the week.

The Carney property is undergoing extensive repairs. Messrs. Fredlock & Co., of Piedmont, have the job.

Mr. Joseph Tibbetts expects to move over to "Gobblers Nob" about June 1 in the house recently erected and about completed by the Davis Coal Co. We regret to lose Joe from our midst as he is a good citizen and whole souled fellow.

Ex-Police Justice Eugene Grannan, of Baltimore, president of the Piedmont & Potomac Coal Company, of Piedmont, was a guest last week of his brother-in-law, Mr. Andrew Mullen. The latter is also one of the directors in the new coal company.

Commissioner Kelso, of Oakland, came to town on last Monday to inspect the work done on the landslide that obstructed the county road between this place and the Bexton mine.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Barnard were in town on Sunday.

Miss Katie Jones, who has been spending the winter with her mother, Mrs. Thomas Swann, left on Sunday morning for a visit to relatives near Mt. Lake Park.

Sheriff Oester was in town last week and after completing his official business took some time to plead the cause of Senator Ravenscroft for renomination. The general impression down here is that A. F. George is making the place pretty hot for his rival and the fight which is now on in dead earnest will be a pretty one.

The latter part of last week witnessed the closing of the pest house at the Junction. The last patient was discharged on Thursday and Dr. Ravenscraft, who has acted as quarantine physician for the past three months and had a fine opportunity to study smallpox in all its phases, vacated the premises on Thursday evening. We understand there is only one house now under quarantine at Piedmont and that the case is very mild.

How To Gain Flesh

Persons have been known to gain a pound a day by taking an ounce of SCOTT'S EMULSION. It is strange, but it often happens.

Somehow the ounce produces the pound; it seems to start the digestive machinery going properly, so that the patient is able to digest and absorb his ordinary food, which he could not do before, and that is the way the gain is made.

A certain amount of flesh is necessary for health; if you have [illegible] it you can get it by taking

Scott's Emulsion

You will find it just as useful in summer as in winter, and if you are thriving upon it don't stop because the weather is warm.

Against His Old Sweetheart.

Robert L. Raines, a prominent Democratic politician of Harmon, W. Va., who was last year a candidate for the West Virginia legislature, has entered suit before Justice of the Peace Imboden Stalnecker, for $27.02, against his former sweetheart, Miss Ella Sartor now Mrs. Arthur Gailey. Rains was enamored of Miss Sartor and testified that she promised to marry him, and as an engaged man he spent money treating her that he would not otherwise have spent. His itemized bill reads:

Ice cream	$10 40
Oysters	5 00
Church contributions	1 32
Fourth of July dinner	2 25
Jewelry	3 05
Money lent	5 00
Total	$27 02

Mr. and Mrs. Gailey employed an attorney to fight the suit, and Justice Stalnecker ruled that the suit should be properly one of breach of promise and referred Rains to the Circuit Court.

Avoid overeating. To rise from the table to eat a little more is a proverbially good rule for every one. There is nothing more idiotic than forcing down a few mouthfuls because they happen to remain on one's plate after hunger is satisfied and because they may be wasted if left. It is the most serious waste to overtax the stomach with even half an ounce more than it can take care of.

Jasper Augustine returned Friday evening from Addison, where he has been for the past week. He says that the contractors who are building the new railroad near Confluence are having considerable trouble with their men. They had a lot of Roanoke colored workmen, who gave them so much trouble that they sent them elsewhere and got a party of Italian workmen.—Uniontown Standard.

The mayors of the small towns like Oakland can do something toward settling the tramp nuisance by putting the vagabonds to work whenever they can catch them. The average hobo dreads nothing so much as wholesome work. It would be to the advantage of the entire community if they could be caroled and with a ball and chain adornment to the legs set to work upon a convenient stone pile or made to clean the streets.

President John K. Cowen, of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, who, as announced, will resign his position as the executive head of that corporation and be succeeded by Mr. L. F. Loree, now fourth vice president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Lines west of Pittsburg, will not, it is definitely understood, sever his connection with the company, but will continue to be a member of its board of directors. He will also become its general counsel and will in addition be special counsel of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which now controls the Baltimore and Ohio. The present general counsel of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is the legal firm of Guthrie, Cravath and Henderson, of New York.

A team belonging to Messrs. D. E. Offutt & Sons, which was engaged in hauling lumber from the station here, became frightened on Friday last at a passing train and ran away. In making the turn from the depot yard the animals collided with an electric light pole, one going on either side of it. This put a stop to their flight and resulted in slight damage to the wagon, the electric light pole and cross arms carrying the wires. Had either horse swerved but a few inches in any direction after nearing the pole one or both of them would have been killed.

A Georgia exchange is responsible for the following: At a revival meeting a man arose and said that he was the wickedest man in town. "I'd go to hell if I should die to-night," he concluded. Immediately an old deacon started the hymn, "If you get there before I do, look out for me, I'm coming too." And then the deacon wondered why everybody laughed.

The "Order of Don't Knock" is the latest candidate for public favor in the way of fraternal societies. In the constitution "knock" is defined as "the deplorable habit of speaking ill of our fellows," and another section binds the members to observe the Golden Rule. When the "Order of Don't Knock" embraces the whole world and its tenets are strictly observed, the millenium will have arrived. In the meantime, success to the "Don't Knockers;" may their tribe increase!

Mr. Charles Brown of Grantsville, Md., was a pleasant caller at the Star office, Monday morning. He feels a great interest in the building of the railroad extension up the Casselman valley into Garrett county, and he thinks now is the time for the people of the county to get awake and do something for themselves. In this Mr. Brown is right, and it would be a very good plan for our southern neighbors to organize a home company for the purpose of prospecting and shafting for minerals. If it can be shown that there is good merchantable coal in paying quantities along the new railway extension or in close proximity to it, then indeed will great prosperity be the inheritance of Garrett county, and a new and brighter epoch will be her lot. Wealth and fame will come her way, and all her citizens will prosper accordingly. But God helps those who help themselves, and if the people of Garrett county do not take advantage of their opportunity, fortune may knock at their doors when they are asleep, pass on and never return.—Salisbury Star.

Patrick O'Brien, of New York, was arrested last Saturday upon a warrant sworn out before Justice Gonder charging him with selling goods without a license. O'Brien has for some weeks been selling goods to the farmers throughout the county in packages which he alleges came direct to him from the manufacturers and therefore exempt from taxation. The hearing took place Monday before Justice Gonder who held O'Brien in the sum of $300 for the action of the grand jury at the September term.

There has been some agitation on the subject of rural free delivery of mail matter from the postoffice here to farmers and towns within a radius of ten miles. The service can be secured by petition to the postoffice department when presented in proper form. In other sections of the country the free delivery of mail has been a boon to the country people and those residing in small villages where mail reaches but once or twice a week. Should the service be established here five or six carriers at $500 per year and a superintendent at a salary something higher will be required.

A proprietor of a shooting gallery at Martinsburg was held up at the point of a 38 caliber revolver by Edgar Keller, of Middletown, Va., in his place of business last Friday. The man walked into the shooting gallery, pulled a revolver from his pocket, pointed it at the proprietor and said: "If there's any shooting to be done in here I'm going to do it." The actions of the strange man caused quite a stir in the gallery. An officer was called in and he was placed under arrest before he could do any damage. He was well supplied with money and promptly paid a fine of $28.50.

The Democratic State Central Committee has recommended to the Governor Dr. E. H. The Preston Lumber Company, whose mills are located at Crellin, Md., are extending their lumber tracks in several different directions in order to reach tracts of newly acquired timber and a large force of Hungarian laborers are hard at work on the extension. The company is doing a mammoth business at present and have yet several years' cutting, which will keep the mill on its present site for some time to come. The railroad belonging to the Preston Company is now within a quarter of a mile of Aurora, and it will be pushed on further. It is the generally expressed opinion that the road—which is of standard guage—will some day connect with the West Virginia Central road at Parsons. Indeed, the route has already been surveyed and right of way has been secured over the whole survey with but the exception of some four miles. The big saw-mill at Crellin is being run to its utmost capacity, and it is quite a busy scene to observe. The mill is equipped with every modern convenience for speed and a large number of hands are employed on the mill alone. The company's pay-roll is an immense one and places thousands of dollars in circulation monthly. The town of Crellin has grown rapidly and aside from its sufficiency of fleas, is a model little lumber town.—Kingwood Argus.

A Bad Freight Wreck.

Last Thursday night a long freight train while going down the 17-mile grade was partially wrecked by the bursting of a car wheel. The south track was torn up for a hundred yards and the north track for about 25 yards. A number of cars were wrecked and the debris thrown on both tracks. All traffic was delayed about four hours.

Fortunately no one was injured, although it is said one of the brakeman made a narrow escape.

In the fall Mr. Hartzell will return to his home with his queer cargo.

Complimentary Tickets.

Editors who receive complimentary tickets to county fairs and other places are often looked upon as deadheads, but the managers of the Woodford (Ill.) county fair, who have some experience in such matters, had the following printed on the complimentary tickets used: "This ticket has probably been paid for ten times by the paper to which it is issued. It will be honored in the hands of man, woman or child, white, black, red or yellow, who favors the association by presenting it. It is good for entrance and grand stand, and bearer, if driving, will be entitled to pass team free. The association recognizes the fact that its splendid success is due to the notices so freely given by the press, and, while we cannot render an equivalent in cash, we return our grateful thanks."

Not Good Taste.

The Somerset Classic Visitor very aptly remarks:

"It is not good taste for families in which death has occurred to give public thanks to their neighbors and friends for assistance rendered, either by the officiating minister or through the press. In some communities the custom to do so prevails yet to a considerable extent. Let it be discontinued. Ministers make such announcements when requested and papers publish them, but not because they think it is the right and proper thing to do. Private acknowledgements of gratitude and appreciation of kindness shown is in place under such circumstances and means something. Public announcements as a rule are out of place and ought not to be made."

Ghosts Stalk About.

Ghosts of most frightful and hideous appearance have taken full possession of the Hilleary house at Fisher, near Elkins, W. Va. They consider themselves neglected since the mansion has been untenanted for several months. The apparitions are now often seen in open daylight. The noises are heard at all times both day and night, clocks striking, taps on a bass drum. Another curious and mournful sound is heard as if some orderly sergeant was calling a roll. Only last week military signals displayed from the east end of the yard that surrounds the mansion were seen by men at work in fields near by. Travelers have for years in passing by the mansion noticed a man in full military dress parading the yard, but nothing was thought of the matter until lately. The Hileary House, on Roaring Creek, occupies one of the most delightful locations in West Virginia. It is an historical landmark. It was here under the shady sugar trees that General Geo. B. McClellan and Gen. Wm. Stark Rosecrans had headquarters, July 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12, 1861, when the battle of Rich mountain was fought. From here all General McClellan's dispatches were written and sent to the war department at Washington.

ITS HEREDITARY EFFECT.

Sins of Drunkenness Visited on Unfortunate Progeny to the Third and Fourth Generation.

In a recent sermon in the Union Gospel News by Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, on the "Sinfulness of Sin," he says: I have been going through the institutions where I have had the privilege of looking upon the insane people confined there, and I have found out the following:

Many people are insane because of the sins of their parents. Results of crime on future generations. At the recent meeting of the Congress of Criminal Anthropology at Geneva, Switzerland, Dr. Legrain, physician-in-chief of the asylum of Ville-Evrard, gave the results of his investigation, which extended over a period of years and showed how sin, like disease, is transmitted from drunken father to appetite enslaved son; how in such soil the seeds of crime and madness develop and ripen in the last generation into sterile idiocy and the extinction of the race.

First Generation: He traced the course of four generations of drinkers in 215 families. One hundred and sixty-eight families showed unmistakable symptoms of degeneracy; 63 cases of mild insanity; 88 were mentally unsound; 45 at times dangerously insane; many of the children were weaklings and died at an early age, 6 out of 8 in one case, 10 out of 16 in another. These six latter who remained, were all feeble-minded and had epileptic fits and were a prey to evil instincts. In 39 families were found convulsions; epilepsy in 52; hysteria in 16; meningitis in 5; 108 families out of the 215 counted one out of every two individuals victims of periodic alcoholic delirium; in 106 families of the 215, insanity had developed.

Second Generation: Ninety-eight observations gave the following: Fifty-four families had one or more members who were imbeciles or idiots; in 23 families there were those who were morally irresponsible, untimely births, extraordinary mortality and hereditary diseases caused the children to die in appalling numbers. At this stage the fathers and mothers had become common drunkards, with but eight exceptions. In 42 families he found chronic cases of convulsions, and epilepsy in 40. In 23 families insanity exists.

Third Generation: Seven observations, or families, gave him a total of 17 children; all mentally unsound and physically stunted; two were insane, four subject to convulsions, two epilepsy, two hysteria, one meningitis, three scrofula.

Summing up the 814 causes found in the 215 families, he found 32.2 per cent. were alcoholics, 60.9 per cent. were degenerates, 13.9 per cent. morally irresponsible, 22.7 per cent. have convulsions, 19 per cent. are incurably insane; 174 disappeared from this world before or almost before having drawn their first breath; 93 cases of tuberculosis which bring the total of those who died from hereditary alcoholism up to one-third.

There is no fifth generation, for the last line is a microcephalous idiot. Thus Moses was right, as proven by science, when he said: "God visits the iniquities of the parents unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate Him." There is no fifth.

TEMPERANCE SERMONETTES.

"My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not."—Prov. 1:10.

Moses surrounded by the luxury of Pharaoh's court and Daniel amidst the enticing luxuries of voluptuous heathenism purposed in their hearts, and kept pure bodies and clear brains.

The appetite is the largest part of every young man, and is the avenue through which Satan works to the destruction of body and soul. The "just one glass," "this one indulgence," of to-day becomes the accepted diet of to-morrow and soon grows to be the consuming passion.

Reason, Wisdom and Love say: "My son." They would have that will of yours so dominate your life as to have you choose good rather than evil. The sinner "entices." The deadly sting of every evil appetite and lust is kept sheathed until the victim, in its power, is made to feel its fatal poison.

The "Sinner" says "consent." Wisdom says "consent NOT." That little word can be made to weigh a TON in one's character and life. As a foundation stone it can support the beautiful superstructure of an admirable character, but, ignored and forgotten, during the days of youth when "Sinner" is enticing, it looms up at the last as the mountain that crushes down to hell.

ONE VIEW OF MRS. NATION.

Further Insight Into Her Character Given in an Account of Her Recent Visit to Cincinnati.

Mrs. Carrie Nation visited the city of Cincinnati recently, having been engaged for a course of lectures. Judging from a report in the Commercial Tribune she is the very reverse of a "crazy fanatic" or a "wild-eyed anarchist." Speaking of her visit to the mayor, that paper says:

"Mrs. Nation's appearance belies the presentment of her features which have preceded her. She is a kindly, motherly, benevolent woman, with a heart overflowing with kindness and a mind capable of holding only one idea at a time. Neatly attired in black, she carried on her bosom a little gold hatchet, and opened the proceedings by stating that it was the duty of the mayor to close, at once, all saloons in the city of Cincinnati."

Accompanied by two police detectives, she visited, during her first night in the city, several "fashionable saloons" and "low resorts," and talked plainly, kindly and pathetically to the inmates. Fallen women and hardened men listened, the former looking sad and some weeping, and the latter cheering and treating her with due deference and respect.

On visiting the mayor of the city, she exhorted him to close the saloons, claiming that he had the power to do so, when the following colloquy, as reported in the Tribune, occurred:

"But," said Mayor Fleischmann, while the crowd facing him grinned unmercifully, "but I really don't know that I want to close the saloons."

"Posibly not, being a distiller," said Mrs. Nation. "I presume you would really be glad to see the products of your distilleries sold in every town in the state, now, wouldn't you?" and Mrs. Nation smiled triumphantly, while Mayor Fleischmann said he did not know but that he really would.

"I thought so," said Mrs. Nation. "You want to be the devil's agent for these hell-holes of saloons. Do you know, Mr. Mayor," said Mrs. Nation, branching off into etymology, "do you know I had a hard time trying to find a real good name for saloons? First, I called them 'devil's homes,' then I thought that wouldn't be hard enough for them, and so now I call them hell-holes, and I think that comes nearer to the right thing, don't you? I know you do! You are a lovely man, and a much nicer man than the mayor of Chicago. Now, when I visited Chicago, Mayor Harrison got out of my way, but you have seen me, and now won't you quit that hell's business you are in and do good?" and Mrs. Nation smiled sweetly at the mayor again, but the chief executive looked at the grinning faces of Messrs. Herrmann, Christie, Longworth and Gass and remained silent.

Mrs. Nation thought she had him converted.

"Do you know that if you don't quit the whisky business and stop all saloons, you will roast in hell?" she asked, cheerfully. "Now, when you come before the Lord, I will be on one side, and you will be on the other, and the Lord will ask you whether you have clothed the naked, and you will be compelled to say that you have taken their clothes from them. Then He will ask you whether you have fed the hungry, and you will be compelled to say that you have taken the food from them. Then He will ask you whether you have visited the sick, and you will be compelled to say that you have made people sick."

"Not with our products," said Mayor Fleischmann, looking in vain for relief.

"Don't interrupt me, please," said Mrs. Nation. "I have a mission, and I'm going to fulfill it. When I look around this room I see a man who has sat on the bench. I do not know from actual observation that he drinks, but his breath betrays him."

Here Judge Longworth blushed a deeper carnation hue.

"I see another man, who is fine-looking, but whose nose betrays his fondness for strong drinks," said Mrs. Nation, as Squire Gass and Mr. Herrmann looked at each other furtively.

"I see two men here who, I am told, are members of high boards in this city, and who have control of the liquor traffic in such cases as you have not, Mr. Mayor, and I must say their countenances tell the story of their passion for alcohol."

At this juncture Messrs. Mullen and McDonough tried to slip out of the room.

"Have you seen many drunken men since you came to Cincinnati?" asked the mayor, managing to get in a word edgewise.

"I can't say that I have," said Mrs. Nation, "but there's a red-faced man in the room, and I know that his family is starving," said she, as Adolph Schmidt, the mayor's clerk, hid his face in his handkerchief and sympathized with Jack McDermott.

"I see men all around me who are slaves of the rum demon," said Mrs. Nation. "I can tell it in their faces, and when the Lord calls you to account, Mr. Mayor, and when you will be led off to where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth, and where the fires are hot, I'll stand on the other side, and I'll tell you that I told you so."

AN ENGLISH ROMANCE.

True Story of a London Cabman Who Married a Rich Girl and Won Army Commission.

Basil Longwood awoke one morning to find that he was a pauper. His elder brother, upon whom the title had descended and who had been named as his guardian to care for his property and give him an income each year, was a hopeless bankrupt. Investigation showed that were the estate sold it would pay but a small amount of the debts that the brother had incurred, and that the patrimony which Basil's father had left him had been squandered.

Not a single farthing of the fortune which Basil had once thought his own could he claim. His brother had not only brought ruin upon the family name, but disgrace as well, and to none of his former friends would Basil go for help.

Basil went to London, and for weeks sought some sort of employment. He could find nothing. Finally, when he was almost starving, he had an opportunity to get a situation as driver of a hansome cab, and accepted at once.

For four years he drove the cab. He had become somewhat embittered and he refused to battle with destiny. He said to himself that fate had conspired to drag him down from his high position, and he would submit.

One day, while driving in a street running into Hyde Park, a phaeton drawn by a pair of gray horses and driven by a young girl came crashing into his cab, and threw him to the pavement. He was picked up and carried into a drug store, where it was found he was badly hurt. The young woman who had driven the phaeton that had caused the accident, sat by him and expressed her sorrow for the unfortunate cab driver.

When Basil was taken to the hospital the young woman called upon him there. Every day she came and brought flowers and fruit and everything that could add to Basil's comfort. She would sit by his bedside by the hour and read to him from the books that he loved.

It was some time before he found courage to ask her name. When he did it made him the more unhappy. She was Isabelle Varness, the daughter of the baronet. Basil could only think of himself as a cabman, and never for a moment would he permit himself ever to speak to Isabelle of love.

But one day while he was asleep and the girl was sitting by him waiting for him to awake, she bent down and kissed him on the forehead.

THEIR FIRST MEETING.

Basil's eyes opened. The girl flushed crimson, and would have ran from the room, but he caught her hands, and before he was well aware he had told her the story of his love, and she had confessed that she loved him and had loved him for a long time, and that her great fear had been that his pride would prevent him from telling her the things that were in his heart.

So when Basil was able to leave the hospital he and Isabelle were married. Then the problem of the future had to be faced. He was determined not to throw himself upon Isabelle's people. But he could no longer drive a cab. He read the call for volunteers for the imperial yeomanry, and Isabelle smiled through her tears as he left her to go to South Africa with his regiment. For a valor at Ladysmith he was promoted and received his D. S. O., and later on his commission and a place in the regular service.

And Isabelle now rejoices that she once nearly murdered a cabby.

How to Keep Brass Bright.

To half a pint of methylated spirit add half an ounce of shellac. Let it stand a few days in a tightly-corked bottle and give it a shake occasionally. Then pour off the clear liquid and use it to paint lightly over your brass after cleaning. It evaporates very quickly, so must be kept well corked. If possible, the brass should be warm when it is applied.

Dainty New Lunch Sandwich.

A new and appetizing sandwich for the lunch basket or the five o'clock tea is made by chopping dates or figs very fine, moistening with hot water and lemon juice and spreading on thin slices of bread. A sprinkling of finely-chopped nuts or nut butter completes the filling.

EMPRESS JOSEPHINE.

Chateau of Malmaison, Where She Lived, to Be Preserved by the French Government.

No place in Paris is more historically interesting than the estate of Malmaison, which is intimately and charmingly associated with the great Napoleon and Empress Josephine. The chateau of the beloved empress sits in the center of a large park, and the grounds and the buildings have been bought by the state as national property, to be preserved as a show place and an object of enlightenment to the masses.

The estate was bought by Josephine de Beauharnais in 1798, and the romantically located grounds afforded Josephine and the future great conqueror their first trysting places. The early and the happiest days of their married life were spent there, and a giant cedar that stands behind the chateau marks the spot where as youthful lovers they played tag, with kisses for forfeits. It was there, too, that the emperor's crown was first offered to Napoleon.

The royal couple seldom visited the home of their courtship and early happiness during the glorious days of the empire, but after her divorce the humiliated empress sought seclusion in this restful retreat, where she died five years later. A year afterward, upon his return from Elba, Napoleon passed a night at the chateau, planning for his last disastrous campaign. Queen Hortense received him affectionately at the home of her mother, perhaps the only woman the great conqueror ever really loved. The last five days of his liberty were also spent there. After the battle of Waterloo and abdication of the throne he returned to Malmaison, whence he was taken to his lonely exile on St. Helena, a saddened and ambition-crushed man.

After the property was sold by Josephine's heirs, it passed through many changes of proprietorship. At various times the chateau has been a point of attack by foes, having been sacked by the Prussians, bombarded by the Germans and besieged by other foreign invaders. Naturally it was allowed to fall into neglect and decay, but it is now being restored, redecorated and refurnished in exactly the same style as when it was occupied by Napoleon and Josephine.

In the neighboring village of Reuil is the grave of Empress Josephine, which is marked by a beautiful white marble monument. The empress, arrayed in her court robes, is represented in a kneeling posture.

Queen Hortense, after the death of her son in the Romangues, went to visit Malmaison, but was refused admission without a ticket, the property being then in the hands of a Swedish banker. It was presented to the state by the present owner, Mr. Osiris. The work of restoration has only just begun, and the chateau is not yet open to public inspection. Josephine's bedchamber, like all the other rooms, will be draped as she herself draped it, and the colors and ornamentations will be copied from the originals, and the little iron chest in which she kept her jewels will stand at the head of the royal bed, as it stood many years before.—Detroit Free Press.

THE WIFE'S PURSE.

It Should Contain an Equitable Share of Her Husband's Income for Her Personal Use.

"The average American husband does not seem to be able to get it through his well-meaning but halting mind that nothing on God's earth humiliates a wife more than to be compelled to ask her husband for money," writes Edward Bok, of "The Wife and Her Money," in the Ladies' Home Journal. "She instinctively hesitates to do it, and ofttimes she goes without rather than ask. Every wife should be given all that it is possible for the husband to allow for household expenses, and it should not be doled out to her in driblets nor given to her as a favor, but as her right, and without question. Over such a share she should have independent sway to do with as she sees fit for the wisest interests of her home and children. That is one rightful step. But there is still another. She should have an allowance of her own apart from the family share of the income. I have no hesitation in saying that if the truth were known it is just this humiliating dependence upon a man for every little trifle that a woman needs that is making thousands of women restless and anxious for outside careers. This is the only fair excuse I have ever been able to see for the hysterical rantings of the modern advanced woman. In that particular she is right and is absolutely justified in filing a protest. A wife is too great and important a factor in the life of her husband to be made a financial dependent."

A Useful Gift.

"Does Josh use that nice new alarm clock I sent him from the city?" asked Farmer Corntossel.

COON HAS FUNNY WAYS.

His Feet Leave Tracks Like Those of a Child and He Catches Crawfish with His Paws.

Did you ever see a coon or raccoon? What a funny, sharp nose he has, and how he follows it, nosing out any and everything eatable. He has whiskers like a cat and a tail with such even dark rings around it that they look as if they had been painted there. His feet are long and slim like those of a monkey, and he makes a little track like a child's. A woodman once told his wife that a child was lost in the forest, for he had seen its footprints, and the worthy couple spent the night searching for it, and at last found a raccoon. I saw a pet coon climb up a window by a set of wooden bars once and attack a wasp's nest, eating the wasps with relish. A man told me a coon story the other day, though, that beats mine. He says: Once I carried the coon with me to a quilting place where there was a swarm of bees. You know a coon loves honey better than anything. The quilting was proceeding nicely—all the women folks sitting around plying their needles—when in dashed the coon, literally covered with bees. He rushed under the quilt, strewing the mad insects.

I tell you the quilting moved, and the chairs flew, and the dresses flapped, and such a dancing was never seen before. Pet coons were not worth much in that market afterward.

Did you ever catch a crawfish? Well, a coon fishes for them in a novel way. A gentleman walking down a stream noticed a number of crawfish holes that were quite smooth, and thought the fish had worn them in passing out. On saying so to a friend he was told that the coons did it by putting their paws in. He did not half believe the story, but as he had a pet coon at home he thought he would test it. So the next day he took the coon with him into the field where there were hundreds of crawfish holes. As soon as the animal saw one he ran his forepaw in as deep as he could, gave it a little jerk, and pretty soon brought it out with a sudden motion with a big crawfish hanging to it. He ate the fish and continued his operations, with better luck than is common to fishermen, until he had eaten a good dinner.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

Lad Who Saved an Infant.

At Allentown, Pa., several weeks ago a terrible flood swept down the mountains and carried devastation in its course. When the waters were at their height Cleveland Downs, a messenger boy, aged 14, saved an Italian infant nine months old from drowning. When the mother of the child dropped it she had an older one in her arms and was powerless to rescue the little one. Her cries for help were promptly answered by the lad, who waded into the water waist deep and rescued the infant.

DOG WITH A CONSCIENCE.

Bundy Obeyed Its Dictates Even at the Risk of Disgrace and Severe Punishment.

Bundy is a big, shaggy dog, with large, brown eyes, which are expressive and beautiful, but barring his eyes, it must be said that he is not handsome. He possesses attractions of another kind, however, which endear him to his master and cause the number of his friends to increase daily.

Bundy's owner lives in the mountains of western Maryland, where mining is the chief industry of the people.

BUNDY WITH HIS BASKET.

Mr. Anthony, his master, is connected with one of the coal mining companies operating in that region, and every morning walks about one mile to his work and back again in the evening. At noon every day it is Bundy's work to carry a basket containing a luncheon across the mountain to his master, and for a long time he has accomplished this duty with evident joy to himself and satisfaction to his owner.

One day some time ago Bundy appeared at the coal-weighing office, where his master works, at the usual hour, but minus the basket. Mr. Anthony was greatly perplexed and thought a circumstance so unusual betokened trouble of some kind at home. After a few questioning words with Bundy, Mr. Anthony started for home, accompanied by the dog, who followed closely upon his master's heels, but seemed ill at ease. Upon reaching the house it was learned that Bundy had left that morning with his basket as usual, and was seen going up the side of the mountain and hurrying on until he was lost to view among the trees.

The mystery was now intensified, but no suspicion of wrongdoing had ever attached to Bundy's good name, and his master would not believe him guilty of unfaithfulness in this instance. A new basket was procured, the daily trips were resumed and Bundy's punctual regularity increased the belief in his innocence. The days and weeks passed on and the mystery still remained as deep as ever.

Perhaps as long as two months after the incident described one day late in the afternoon Bundy was seen approaching the house carrying the missing basket in his mouth. Slowly walking up to the kitchen door he dropped the basket and then quickly ran away, hiding himself in the shadows under the big porch. The luncheon was found intact, just as it had been placed in the basket on the morning it was prepared for his master.

On the same day, up on the mountain side, just a little back from the path leading to the weighing office, a hole in the ground was found and the pile of leaves and earth freshly heaped by its side told the story of the missing basket.

Since the discovery, Mr. Anthony loves the devoted dog more than ever, for he insists that Bundy has proved he has a conscience and that he obeys it, following its promptings even at the risk of disgrace and punishment.—Chicago Record.

SIXTY DOLLARS AN HOUR.

Estimated Cost to the Citizens of Boston of Keeping Watch on Two Rat Holes the Other Day.

This is a story of a rat and two holes in the ground. The holes were very small holes, just big enough to let two rats into the cellar of the Old South meeting house, and probably more than big enough to let them, wiser and leaner rats, out again, says the Boston Evening Transcript.

These two holes, with the intermittent assistance of the rat, entertained the good citizens of Boston at the rate of 2,000 an hour for an indefinite period in the middle of one day recently. It is easy enough to reckon. During the show there were from 30 to 35 people standing in choice positions along the Milk and Washington street railings of the fence about the tiny yard of the Old South meeting house—a constantly changing crowd that renewed itself every minute.

Now in this crowd were all kinds of persons, from the office boy at three dollars a week to the broker at $300. Everyone watched his minute before he went about his business; for some the monetary loss was only the fraction of a cent; for others it mounted up in the dollars. A low and conservative estimate of the average monetary value of these people is 20 cents an hour. Thirty people standing for one minute are equal to one person standing for half an hour. But the entertainment extended over many minutes. An hour of it for 2,000 people was paid for by Boston employes in $60 worth of time.

What did this $60 crowd of 2,000 persons see for its money? Most of the people two holes in the ground; some of them the bright, beady eyes and the whiskered nose of a rat. The poor fellow was probably trying to get away to some less hallowed, but more fruitful surroundings, when the first observing eye saw him and by looking collected the audience. He lay low for many long minutes, so many that the whole crowd about the fence was in utter ignorance of what it was watching; but still the crowd hung on, looking at the holes, or gazing up at the sparrows which twittered in and out of their nests in the close ivy growth on the wall. Every time the rat looked out one or two saw him, and then everybody devoted his attention to the holes again. And neither rats nor holes can have known how much they were costing the employers all over Boston.

Water Flowed Like Champagne.

"Speaking of diplomatists, reminds me that Mrs. Hayes, who, as you remember, was a stanch teetotaler, argued with me for an hour over the first dinner the president was to give to the foreign representatives. I tried to make her see that it would be no sacrifice to principle on her part to set wine on the table, but only the civility we always show to guests by recognizing their ways of living at home.

"'I'm afraid,' she declared, 'that the ministers will have to make up their minds to be sociable with water.'

"And I shocked her dreadfully by answering: 'Mrs. Hayes, I have never known people to be sociable with water—except in a bath.'"

"Did Mrs. Hayes carry her point?" he was asked.

"Yes, indeed," he responded, with a dry chuckle. "She had the dinner as she wanted it, and the water flowed like champagne."—N. Y. Post.

The Old, Old Story.

Dr. Nacnamara, M. P., is skeptical of the origin of most of the witticisms ascribed to children. He asserts that they are manufactured by children of an older growth, chiefly because they make good reading. But in his own experience he has come across some genuine witticisms, some of them unconsciously humorous, by school children. At an examination in Scripture the question was asked: "What did Moses do for a living while he was with Jethro?" A worldly-wise youngster replied: "Please, sir, he married one of Jethro's daughters."—London Chronicle.

Everybody Happy.

A gentleman who had been intrenched behind a newspaper in a crowded car happened to look out of the tail of his eye and to see a lady standing whom he knew.

He rose and was about to offer the lady his seat when a colored man, who thought he was vacating his seat, slipped into it.

"Look here," said the riser, "I was going to give that seat to this lady."

The colored man instantly arose with a profound bow.

"Suttinly, sah," he said, "I'm something of a lady's man myself, sah."

And the lady was bowed into her seat amid smiles all around.—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

A GIFTED AND BEAUTIFUL GIRL

Threatened With Nervous Prostration,

PROMPTLY SAVED BY PE-RU-NA.

MISS ROSE CULLEN, OF BUTTE, MONT.

Miss Rose Cullen, President Young Woman's Club, of Butte, Mont., writes from 921 Galena street, as follows:

"Peruna has many friends in Butte. I cannot say too much in praise of it. While finishing school I became very nervous and exhausted from over-study. I was weak and sick, and could neither eat, sleep, nor enjoy life. A couple of bottles of Peruna put new life in me. I find that having it in the house and taking a dose off and on keeps me in fine health.

"A large number of my friends place Peruna at the head of all medicines."— Miss Rose Cullen.

How Peruna Quickly Cures Backache, the Bane of Womankind.

MRS. G. W. HEARD, Hempstead, Texas, writes:

"We have moved recently, and I must have lifted something that was too heavy for me in straightening things up, for I had such a backache and could hardly stand on my feet at all. Beside, I was so tired all the time. My face was spotted and I was very thin. I took one bottle of Peruna and was soon real well. When I feel tired and all run down I take Peruna and feel all right before I finish one bottle. I know it is a wonderful medicine, and both myself and husband praise Peruna.

"There has been a great deal of sickness through this part of the country, but, thanks to Peruna, which we use freely, our own family has escaped with almost no sickness at all.

"Could you but see our baby Ruby (to whom we gave Peruna for bowel trouble), you would see from her robust looks that you need no better advertisement in this little town. She is so fat and rosy, is nearly five years old now, and is a great believer in Peruna."—Mrs. G. W. Heard.

Given Up to Die—All Doctors Failed—It Proved to be Catarrh of Stomach and Was Cured by Peruna.

W. A. Mitchell, dealer in general merchandise, of Martin, Ga., writes:

"I wrote you some time ago concerning my wife's case. She had tried all of the best doctors, and we got to where we thought all they did was against her. She weighed about 190 pounds when she was in good health. When she commenced with our family physician in April, 1898, she weighed about 150, but kept going down all the time. She went to Atlanta, Ga., and took treatment, but it did her no good. Then she went to Harmony Grove, Ga., and took treatment from the best physician there for three months. She kept going down under his treatment, although he was considered the best physician in the county. She went down from 130 pounds to 68, and we saw she could not live long. She was a skeleton. We consulted an old physician who told her to use Peruna. She gradually improved and got stronger. She has gained 38 pounds since she has taken Peruna, and is gaining every day, and does her own housework.

"She was well known when she was so low, and now everybody wants to know what cured her. She had indigestion and catarrh of the stomach. It is as good for children as for grown people. We haven't had to have a doctor for one of our children since 1898."—W. A. Mitchell.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

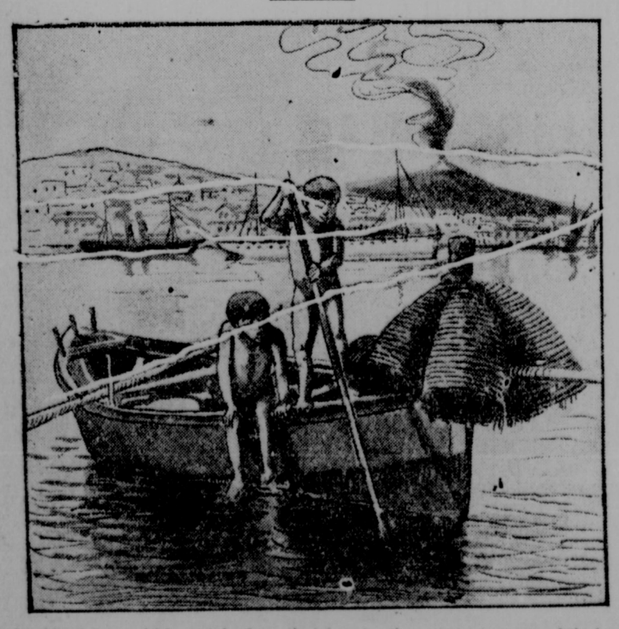
WATER RATS IN NAPLES, ITALY.



In this picture, which we take from the Chicago Record, are shown two of the water rats of Naples. They are only harmless boys who have been brought up close to the water. These boys can swim like so many rats and are as hard to catch by the police as are our boys who live along the wharves. These boys of Naples make a living by diving for pennies. When the big ocean steamers come to Italy from America the water rats surround the boats and cry: "Penny, penny in the water, please. Hurry up, please," and few can resist their pleadings. So over goes a penny and into the water all the water rats dive at once, and soon up comes the lucky one with it in his mouth. Then it is "Penny, please," again until the ship leaves port. These boys are mostly the sons of fishermen.

THE STATE CENSUS.

Additional Delegate Each for Garrett, Harford, Howard and Kent Counties.

Reports from the State enumerators, it is stated, will show an increase of a few thousand more in the population than the number given by the revised federal census. It is stated "Washington county will remain with four members of the house as at the present time." The government census would have given the county five representatives. The new census will give Garrett an additional delegate. Harford county will show an increase sufficient to give five members of the House of Delegates instead of four, as at present. Howard, Gorman's home county, will show considerable increase and will be entitled to three Democratic members of the house, instead of two, as at the present time. Kent county will show an increase sufficient to give it three members of the house, instead of two.

The State census gives Brunswick a resident population of over 2,800, with a boarding population of over 300 in addition to the above figures. The Brunswick Herald says: "The national census taken last June gave Brunswick a population of about 2,450. This shows a net gain in bona fide citizens of about 400 in eleven months. There is not the slightest doubt but that the census was accurately taken each time."

Col. Buchanan Schley has issued a circular letter to all of the Baltimore city census employes stating that they will be paid their per diem July 1 at the census bureau and that no transfer of claims will be recognized by the census bureau. The county enumerators will be paid by check to be mailed to them.

No Church for Oakland.

At the recent meeting of the Western Maryland District of the German Baptist Brethren the follow resolution with respect to the erection of a church in Oakland was presented and adopted:

To the D. M. of Western Maryland:

We, your committee appointed in behalf of the Oakland church, beg leave to report the following:

WHEREAS, Repeated calls have been made for a church in Oakland and D. M. of 1899 having declared its intention to build one, we, your committee appointed to look after this work have endeavored to consider both the inducements and hindrances, the propriety and impropriety of the same.

We have found some who give us much encouragement, and after having made a partial canvas in view of the means, have found that $1000 or more is at once at our command, and more if needed, so we feel sure the means could be had; but while we have found this encouraging, we have found many others who, though they would like to see a church there and would be willing to assist to some extent, do not consider it advisable for the following reasons: There are already a number of churches there, and good ones and strong in number of members, and yet none of them WELL attended and some of them very poorly indeed, and our congregations there have always been very small and our membership almost nothing; and, further, it is our experience that secret orders, which have become so popular in this age, are detrimental not only to our church work in cities and towns but are sapping the very life out of other churches. We are, therefore, compelled, after investigation, to report that we deem it not good business judgment to invest, under the circumstances, at present, but desire to tender our sincere thanks to all who have encouraged the work and especially to all those who had so kinkly and generously tendered us the lots.

World's Record Has the B. & O. in New Equipment.

While other roads are boasting of their new equipment, it must not be forgotten that the Baltimore and Ohio leads them all in the matter of new equipment purchased recently. In 12 months this road has purchased new equipment as follows:

Steel cars	6,000
Box cars	25,000
Flat cars	500
Locomotives	225
Coaches	25
Combination cars	2
Express cars	10
Baggage cars	10
Cafe parlor cars	2
Total	31,774

This is said to be the greatest record for new equipment ever made in one year by any railroad in the world and it certainly shows how the B. & O. is prospering under the present able management.

EMPEROR WILKES
TIME, 2.28.

Will stand at the stables of the undersigned in Oakland on the following terms:

$10 to Insure a Mare With Foal.

Money to be paid when mare is known to be with foal. Persons parting with a mare or fails to attend forfeits insurance money. A lien will be retained on the colt until insurance is paid. We will not be responsible for accidents should any occur, but the best of care to prevent such will be exerted.

This horse has a record of 2.34. On a trial he trotted a mile in 2.28. He is a full brother of WILL KERR, 2.07¼, Champion Green Harness Horse of the World, and also of VINETTE, 2.09¼.

EMPEROR WILKES is a dark bay stallion, snip on nose, black points, height 15½ hands. He was bred by Thompson & Bro., Cynthiana, Ky. He comes from the best trotting family of horses in this country and has a bright future. He is the sire of the fastest colts in Garrett county and is without doubt the best bred stallion and the fastest trotting animal in Western Maryland.

VALUABLE REAL ESTATE FOR SALE.

83½ acres coal land on Youghiogheny river, 7 miles north of Oakland.

The Andrews property in Oakland for sale. House on 5th street, opposite the jail for sale.

A farm one mile from Oakland, containing 187½ acres; about 50 or 60 acres cleared and under cultivation; has been thoroughly limed. Balance of land well timbered. On this farm is one of the best dwelling houses in the county; also stables, wagon sheds, spring house and all necessary outbuildings; water within five feet of kitchen door. This property will be sold cheap.

New house containing eight rooms, cellar, etc., and 26½ acres of ground; barn, stable, and all other outbuildings, adjoining the town of Grantsville, Garrett county. This property is known as the Samuel J. Beachy property, and will be sold cheap.

A farm five miles from Oakland on the Aurora road, containing 200 acres, well watered, fenced, etc.; a good dwelling house, a new barn built last year cost $1,000, and all other necessary outbuildings. This property will be sold on easy terms.

A farm 2½ miles southwest of Oakland, containing ninety acres of ground, well watered and fenced; has been thoroughly limed, and is under a high state of cultivation. First-class dwelling house; new bank barn put up this year; stone spring house and all other necessary outbuildings. One hundred and twenty-five bearing fruit trees of choicest variety. This farm can be bought on easy terms.

A farm five and two-third miles north of Swanton, containing one hundred and ten acres of land, comparatively level, well watered and under fence; eighty acres cleared and under a high state of cultivation; twenty-five acres of good timber; an orchard which never fails to produce fruit, consisting of peaches, pears, plums and apple trees. The buildings on this farm consist of an elegant dwelling house, containing six rooms and a cellar; a bank barn 40x60 feet; a spring house and all necessary outbuildings. This farm can be bought for part cash and balance on time to suit purchaser.

A farm known as the "Swanger Mill Property," containing eighty-six acres of land, partly cleared and balance in hemlock timber. The buildings consist of a dwelling house, small storehouse, a water-power grist mill, stable and all other necessary outbuildings. Besides being well watered by a stream running from one end of the place to the other it has on it a lake, covering about seven acres, which has been stocked with 40,000 brook and rain bow trout. This property can be bought at a low figure, part cash and balance on time, to suit purchaser, at five per cent. interest.

I have also houses to rent and sell in the town of Oakland.

NOTICE TO Tax Payers!

This is to notify the tax payers of Garrett county that the annual levy for 1901 has been made and published, and to call their attention to the following abstract, Section 45, Chapter 566, Acts of 1880, relating to the discount to be allowed and the interest to be charged on all tax bills:

"All county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of the levy thereof, and on all county taxes paid on or before the first day of September a discount of 3 per cent. shall be allowed, and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. The Treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the tax bills for county purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt given for taxes so paid. But the discount shall not be allowed unless the whole amount of State and county taxes are paid when same is made.

SEVEN DEVELOPED GOLD MINES.

60 ACRES OF GOLD ORE

THE ARENA Gold Mining and Milling Company

CRIPPLE CREEK, COLORADO.

This Property is Estimated to be now Worth More than $10,000 per Acre and will be Worth over One Hundred Thousand Dollars per Acre, with Proper Development.

CAPITAL STOCK, $1,000,000,

Divided into Shares of $1.00 Each, Full Paid and Non-Assessable.

The Arena Company offers 50,000 Shares at 50 cents each in a Property that is Worth over $600,000

For the purpose of raising money to purchase the necessary machinery to make the mines produce daily fully THREE THOUSAND DOLLARS IN GOLD, thus enriching every individual shareholder according to the shares he holds.

YOU CAN BUY ANY NUMBER OF SHARES YOU WISH,

and make more money than can be made in any other line of investment. The gold ore is in these seven developed mines. There are 4,000 feet of ore in a vein, and these veins are true mother veins, held within walls of granite, placed there by nature. The Company has already developed this property to demonstrate that it is one of the largest gold properties of the Cripple Creek District which is the greatest gold-producing camp on earth, its output last year aggregating $24,000,000, or nearly double the amount produced in the whole State of California.

At 50 cents per Share the Company is giving you a discount of 10 cents per share to start with, making 20 cents on the dollar. As already stated, this is done for the purpose of raising $25,000 to purchase improved machinery, air-compressor drills and electric plant. We have two large hoisting engines on this property, a commodious shaft-house, office buildings, boarding house for the men, stables, a powder-house, a large quantity of tools, etc. The reports on these mines, made by one of the best mining engineers in the State, succinctly describe these improvements.

NAMES OF MINES.

AZTEC, 210 feet in depth, with shaft-house, boiler and engine for hoisting, well timbered all the way down.
BONDHOLDER, 260 feet deep, hoisting engine and boiler, large iron shaft-house.
MEXICO AND MANHATTAN, both over 100 feet deep, on same vein as the Aztec mine.
CRYSTAL, JASPER AND GREAT EASTERN, on the same vein as the Bondholder, and opened in depth of 100 feet, and developments already made show over 4,000 feet of ore.

If you want to make money out of nature, become a producer of gold out of her treasure-vaults. The Arena group of mines will do it for you.

We can furnish the best of references—bank and mining engineers—and our title in the property is perfect, coming as it does through a patent from the Government. With more improved machinery, from $5,000 to $5,000 per day will be a conservative estimate of the output of these mines.

Remember that only 50,000 shares of this stock are for sale at 50 cents on the dollar. Orders for the number of shares desired, accompanied by Draft, Money Orders, Express or Cash in Registered Letters, can be sent to

The Arena Gold Mining and Milling Company,

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 25. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JUNE 6, 1901. NUMBER 13.

APATHY EXISTS.

Ex-Gov. Brown Has Touched Off a Bomb Shell Among Maryland Democrats.

Arthur P. Gorman's hand will guide the Democratic party in Maryland and Murray Vandiver will remain as chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee. This summarizes the situation as it now appears. Conflict and dissension, however, has been precipitated by former Governor Frank Brown, who in a published interview declared that the Democratic party could not hope to achieve success unless new men and new methods were employed.

"The greatest levers of success in political battles," says ex-Governor Brown, "are:

"First—Good nominations.

"Second—Good platforms, followed by the declaration that 'to the victor belongs the spoils,' with the old maxim that reasonable rotation in office is healthy for all political parties.

"Every man in this State who has held political office by election or appointment, no matter how marked his ability or how well qualified he is or was for the position he may have held, should recognize that there are other people in the State who are possibly as equally well qualified as he and who would like to have an opportunity to show their qualifications for some of the offices at the disposal of the successful party. No man or party can continuously succeed unless some liberality is shown in distributing the honors at the hands of the party, both as to elective offices and public patronage.

"There is an old saying that 'Nothing succeeds like success.' No army of soldiers can be enthused to follow a continuously defeated leader or commanding officer. A successful campaign in the city or State can only be made when the whole party is thoroughly aroused and are confident of victory. Many of the so-called leaders, officeholders and ex-officeholders have become 'shop-worn.' They are like 'old maids' at a ball. They will dance without being asked and frequently without a partner. These self-appointed leaders could not make a 'cakewalk' a success, because the first requisite to make a success of a cakewalk would be to have new people to do the dancing.

"Therefore, I say, these so-called leaders should of their own volition retire and call upon the young men of the State to come to the front, while they step to the rear and help push the young men on to their party's success. The party that will first throw out this inducement to the young men of the State will dominate the State politically in two years.

"Now if the Democrats of this State want their party to succeed locally in the State of Maryland they must put before the people of this State acceptable candidates and a State platform that is in harmony with the verdict of the people in the national contests referred to.

"The defeat of the Democratic ticket in the city election a few days ago in Baltimore city was, in my judgment, caused—

"First. By bad management and a want of energy in the leadership.

"Second. By an effort on the part of some Democrats to force an endorsement of the present city administration into the campaign.

"Third. The city and State campaign committee seemed unable to realize the apathy of the party.

"Therefore, with the strongest personal and political friendship for the present chairman of the State Central committee, and for each and all of those who have formed a part or parcel of this and the campaign committees of the State, I say to them that it is, in my judgment, absolutely essential that the head of this committee should be changed and that some vigorous, ambitious young man, representing the younger element of the party in this State, should be placed in charge of this committee, and that he should be surrounded by men of similar type, so far as it is possible and practical, throughout the State, and take my word for it that if the party is given this opportunity, and there is a united effort throughout the State to put on the tickets of the various counties of the State and the city of Baltimore none but the best material that the party can possibly select, there will be no question as to the victory in November next.

"I was of the opinion in the fall of 1900 that this campaign had best be made directly as a senatorial fight, but within the past few weeks my mind has changed. I am under the impression that the people of this State are not prepared as yet to make their selections."

CORKSCREW PHILOSOPHY.

Self-gratificatinn is always dangerous.

What you like is often more harmful than what you dislike.

A community of interests is nature's greatest law. It is the basis of all government.

The physical being depends upon the mental seeing, and a rational will.

Christian Science has a basis of fact with a superstructure of nonsense. Most creeds have the same failing.

If reasonable happiness you would find,—keep an open heart, an open eye and an open mind.

When a woman has given you a piece of her mind you may feel sure that she has none left.

When women can treat each other fairly without regard to class, the millenium is close at hand.

Race rotteness begins with class selfishness. He who denies his fellow man denies God.

The poorer one is the greater the way for rising upward, and the wider his range for knowing humanity.

Dr. Charles F. Thwing is the idol of the female suffragists. He ith thwinging around a thircle of nonthenth, judging from some of his recent remarks.

According to Dr. Thwing, man is but an ignorant, boorish creature at best, and the educated woman will refuse to marry him, rather than lower herself to his ignorant level.

If higher education for woman is to bring a denial of mothernood there will be fewer fool presidents of high class colleges. Nature will take no special action in the matter. The useless generally eliminates itself.

JACKSON.

Proposed Amendments.

Governor Smith will soon issue his proclamation submitting to the people three constitutional amendments. They are as follows:

1. Dividing the city of Baltimore into four Legislative districts of as nearly equal proportion as may be, and of contiguous territory, and giving the city one Senator from each of the districts, making four instead of three Senators as heretofore.

2. Increasing the representation of the city of Baltimore in the House of Delegates from 18 to 24 by allowing to each of the four Legislative districts so created representation equal to that enjoyed by the largest county, which is six Delegates.

The county basis of apportionment is not changed, the effects of the two amendments being simply to provide for Baltimore city one additional Legislative district, one more Senator and six more Delegates in the General Assembly of 1904.

3. Providing the State's attorneys of counties shall perform such duties and receive such fees and commissions or salary, not exceeding $3,000, as may now or may hereafter be prescribed by law. Fixing the salary of the State's attorney for Baltimore city at $4,500 a year, with power to appoint one deputy at $3,000 a year and such other assistants at not exceeding $1,500 a year as the Supreme Bench of Baltimore city may approve; all of such salaries to be paid out of the fees of the State's attorney's office, as has heretofore been the practice.

THE TELEPHONE IN BOWERSVILLE.

We've got the telephone at last down here
in Bowersville;
The wires is stretched from Jimmy Lane's clear down to Griggses Mill;
The bells is ringin' all the time—an' don't it beat the Dutch!
The womenfolks that always talked—they now talk twice as much;
An' every day young Henry Sykes—our cut-up—sez, sez he:
"Hello, there, central, I would like to have the brewery."

Ah, sence we got the telephones I stand here in the street
An' hear the talk all over town in voices loud or sweet;
The folks call one another up an' talk till they're half dead,
An' then go meet each other to explain what all they said.
The town is like a phonypraphit a runnin' fit to kill
Sence we have got the telephones down here
in Bowersville.

An' yistuddy I called up nine-eleven-fifty-four
To have a little friendly talk with Ol' Isaiah Moore.
The feller at the telephone he hollers back to me:
"You can't get no connections there—he's busy now," sez he.
An' I sez: "Well, just let him 'lone. These things jest fill the bill—
It's first time he's been busy sence he come to Bowersville."

THE BLESSING OF HARMONY.

Unity of Thought and Action Crowned the State Republican Meeting—Convention Dates Named.

BALTIMORE, June 4.—The Republican State Central Committee met shortly after noon today at Raines' hall. The meeting was one of the most largely attended in the history of the committee.

Ninety-eight members out of 117 were present in person or by proxy.

Mr. Phillips Lee Goldsborough, chairman of the committee, in calling the meeting together, in part, says:

"Fresh from the victory of 1900 and the recent spring election in this city, brought about not alone by our own efforts, but by and with the aid given us by the Independents and the Independent Democrats of the city and State—men who place the welfare of their nation, State and city above party success, I am convinced that you feel confident of your ability again to guide the party to success this coming fall—and this, too, in the face of the election law passed by the Democrats at the extraordinary session of the General Assembly of this State held a few months since—a law passed purely for partisan gain; for the purpose of depriving a large number of Marvland's citizens and tax payers of their right to have a voice in the government of their State.

"But the fight which now lies before us cannot and will not be won, save that we prepare for it by most thorough and systematic organization; and especially would I impress upon you the absolute necessity of thoroughly looking after the instruction of the illiterate voters of our party."

Senator McComas, though not a member of the State Central Committee, attended the meeting and sat with the Washington county delegates, about midway down the hall.

The main business of the committee was to adopt rules for the government of the primaries in Baltimore city, to set dates for the State and Baltimore city conventions, to appoint a day for the Baltimore city primaries and to set dates for the First and Fifth district judicial conventions.

It was decided that the State convention shall be held in Baltimore on August 6; the city convention on July 11; the city primaries on July 8; the First district convention at Ocean City on July 25, and the Fifth district convention at Westminster on August 27.

Resolutions governing the primaries in Baltimore city were the same as those adopted by the committee last week. They were presented by City Chairman Mason, and to only one point of them was any objection raised.

A board of appeals, consisting of the executive member of the State Central committee, is credited, to whom all questions of appeal by any set of delegates should be referred. Messrs. S. R. Mason, Wm. M. Stewart and Alfred J. Schultz become the members of this board by virtue of their offices.

The member of the committee seemed to agree that the meeting had been a most harmonious and beneficial one.

The feeling that the Republicans were on the eve of a successful fight was most pronounced. There was not the slightest feeling of despondency at the passage of the new election law, and the experience which Baltimore has already had with it was, in the opinion of all, a most encouraging thing. The present state of chaos in the Democratic party also brought forth much encouraging comment.

Chairman Goldsborough said that the date of the State convention was postponed to August 6, because the convention would be held according to the apportionment made by Gov. John Walter Smith, which will not be announced until probably July 15, as required by law. County primaries before August 3 and after July 15 were usually very inconvenient on account of the wheat crops, and it was thought best to put the date of the convention of until after August 1st.

The Republican nomination for judge in the First district will probably go to Tax Commissioner Robert P. Graham, of Wicomico county. The fact that Mr. Graham comes from Wicomico county, where the chief fight among the Democratic candidates—Judge Charles F. Holland and James E. Ellegood—seems to indicate that Wicomico county will have the first right to name an opponent.

Not seeing any items in your valuable paper from our town for some time I thought it not out of place to write a few lines.

The two year old daughter of E. J. Stuck was accidentally shot and seriously wounded last Monday morning by her brother Ray, but under the care and good treatment of Dr. A. J. Mason she is getting along fine and there is hope for her recovery.

Mr. and Mrs. Bert Lowdermilk, of Addison, were visiting friends here.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Humbertson, of near Addison, were visiting E. J. Frantz last Sunday.

Politics are beginning to get hot in District No. 2, but E. J. Frantz seems to have the lead as he is talked of very strong for sheriff. Mr. Frantz has been a lifelong Republican and a hard worker in the party and we think deserves the nomination at the hands of the party. We know if he be nominated and elected he will make one of the best sheriffs the county has ever had.

NO NEED FOR EXTRA SESSION.

Congress Will Not be Called to Legislate For the Philippines.

WASHINGTON, June 4.—Immediately after a cabinet session of two and a quarter hours today the following announcement was made by direction of the President and cabinet:

"The President has determined that existing conditions do not require or warrant calling Congress together during the present summer or making any change in the policy hitherto pursued and announced in regard to the Philippine Islands."

The statement is so concise as to leave nothing to be said except of detail as to how the opinion was reached by the President and his advisers. It is further stated that the conclusion was unanimous, and that there was not even a difference of opinion in the most minor features.

Practically the same conclusion was reached by the cabinet at the session last Friday. As there was room for fuller discussion and investigation, however, the President then asked Attorney General Knox to give the subject of the bearing of the supreme court decision on the Philipines his attention with a view of presenting his opinion. Mr. Knox told the cabinet today that he had never had any doubt that the affairs of the Philippines could continue to be conducted as at the present time. He had examined the Spooner and other amendments relating to the Philippines and had carfully gone over the Porto Rican decisions of the supreme court. He felt that the President had ample authority to continue in force the tariff regulations that have governed the importation and exportation of goods from the islands. Mr. Knox did not render a formal opinion and simply gave the President and cabinet his views. These were delivered in that quiet, forceful manner that has made such an excellent impression in Washington.

The main point upon which the opinion was based is that the Philppines are not on a civil basis and will not be so long as they are subject to the control and direction of the United States and the war department. Even with the inauguration of what is called civil government on the 1st of July, as the President intends, the islands will continue to remain under military control until Congress shall have taken the matter in hand and passed complete laws changing the administration of affairs to a positive civil law establishment. The attorney general elucidated this view by pointing out the civil government in the Philippines is merely on trial and that is upheld by the military authority.

Unnecessary Loss of Time.

Mr. W. S. Whedon, Cashier of the First National Bank of Winterset, Iowa, in a recent letter gives some experience with a carpenter in his employ, that will be of value to other mechanics. He says: "I had a carpenter working for me who was obliged to stop work for several days on account of diarrhoea. I mentioned to him that I had been similarly troubled and that Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy had cured me. He bought a bottle of it from the druggist here and informed me that one dose cured him, and he is again at his work." For sale by all dealers.

Decoration Day at Friendsville.

HOYES, MD, June 3, 1901.

Decoration Services were held at Friendsville, May 30. Twenty old soldiers were present. Forty-four graves were decorated. The Friendsville Band rendered good service. Friendsville Choir gave us splendid, appropriate music.

The speaker of the day was Rev. Donachi. Rev. D. A. Friend and Prof. Sanner entertained us for awhile profitably.

A large crowd of people were there and order prevailed all through the day.

We are thankful for the services rendered, and for the flowers contributed.

May we all be spared to meet together on another Memorial day.

HIS LIFE SAVED

By Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy.

"I am sure that Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy at one time saved my life," says A. E. Lafalette, of Gregory Landing, Clark county, Missouri. "I was in such bad shape that the doctors said I could not live. When I was at the lowest ebb, one of my neighbors brought in a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy and I took it and got instant relief. I soon got up and around. That was nine years ago and I am still in good health. Since then that medicine has always been in my house and always will be. It is the best on earth." For sale by all dealers.

Hick's Forecast For June.

June will come in at the culmination stages of a storm period which begins the last day of May. Full moon at extreme south declination on the second will intensify electrical storms, but will cause a drift of atmospheric tides from the north and bring down over the country a marked change to cooler immediately at the close of the storms. A return of storm conditions will appear on and touching the 4th to 6th, showers resulting from the falling barometer and higher temperature on those dates. Rising barometer and cooler fair weather will be the natural order behind the disturbances of this period, lasting progressively from about the 6th to 8th.

The regular Vulcan storm period extending from the 8th to the 13th, leads fully into June solstice perturbations, with a mercury disturbance also central on the 12th. Moon is on the celestial equator on the 9th, thunder storms and much general and continuous lightning will illuminate the evenings and nights for days in succession. About Sunday the 9th to Wednesday the 12th many electrical storms, with rain and possible violence, will most likely occur. The annual June showers are naturally to be looked for from this time until near the end of the month, but storms of wide extent and dangerous intensity are quite likely at the centers of the vulcan and mercury periods, due from the 15th to 18th, the moon being in perigee on the 14th, at greatest north declination on the 15th and at new moon on the 16th; very warm, muggy weather will prevail and heavy rain storms will visit localities, especially regions along the Alantic Seaboard. But we fear that even at this solstice period—the most favorable time ordinarily for general rains—there will be a marked shortage of diffused rainfalls, and that many interior sections in the grain growing states will feel thus early the effects of drouth.

The vulcan storm period extending from the 20th to the 26th will bring the culmination of the June solstice storms. For a number of days there will be a repetition of intense and vivid electrical storms, with cloudbursts here and there. Some narrow localities will have too much rain and local floods; but immediately after we pass out of the June rains it will be found that the greater part of the country is short of moisture, and general rains will be needed to mature the crops in most central, western and northern sections. We reiterate our belief that regions near the Gulf will not be visited by such deluge as during the year past, and that drouth even there will begin to take the place of floods during this season.

Some of the most decided storms of the month are probable about Friday the 21st, to Tuesday the 25th. This period is exactly at the time when Earth reaches the turning point in its orbit, and when all the elements of our globe and atmosphere feel the shock and revulsion of Earth's backward movement. Just at the crisis of these things, the Moon is on the celestial equator on the 22nd, a fact that greatly tends to increase lightning and thunder storms at all times.

We close the forecasts with the warning we have often given for June; let our readers mark what we say: Do not take shelter under trees on the approach of thunder storms.

We caution our readers against the danger of losing their new cut grasses by having them wet with June showers.

Mail Schedule Changed.

An order has been issued by the Postoffice Department which is to take effect on Juiy 1st changing the schedule of carrying the mails on the star route from Bittinger via New Germany to Grantsville. As arranged at present the starting point on the route is at Bittinger, which gives good service, placing the mails in Grantsville in time to catch the route for Frostburg, Keyser and Accident. The contemplated change will make Grantsville the starting point and will delay mails both going to and coming from Bittinger and New Germany to points outside of the immediate route from 24 to 36 hours. A protest against the change is being prepared and will be forwarded to Congressman Pearre.

Love's Strange Spell

By William J. Lampton.

(From the Saturday Evening Post, of Philadelphia. Copyrighted. Reprinted by Special Permission.)

A SOLEMN stillness pervaded the sanctum of the Sorghumville Scorcher. The Exchange Fiend was hid behind a newspaper; Old Subscriber sat on the coal-box, smoking; Vox Populi was writing a protest against the prevalence of pigs on the streets; and Taxpayer, who had just come in, was backed up to the stove. The editor sat at his table with his chair tilted back and his legs doubled and twisted under him. It was a posture of great mental endeavor with him. There had been a spelling bee at the schoolhouse for the benefit of the Methodist church, and the editor wanted to make a feature of it.

"Gittin' ready to jump on the administration or sumpthin' like that?" inquired the taxpayer, observing the editor's couchant attitude.

"No," smiled the editor. "I'm trying to do something extra nice for the Methodist spelling match the other evening."

"I hear they tuck in $7.15," said the taxpayer.

"Seven dollars and 17 cents," corrected Old Subscriber. "Somebody dropped in a postage stamp that stuck to the side of the box and wasn't counted till after the report was made."

"Speakin' of spellin' bees," said the taxpayer, addressing the editor, "do you recollect that time you got floored?"

Everybody became attentive, for the editor had a county-wide reputation as a speller.

"Don't I?" laughed the editor. "I guess I'd be a bachelor if it hadn't been for that."

"I've clean forgot," reflected the old subscriber. "How was it, anyhow?"

The editor undoubled and swung half around in his chair to face his auditors.

"Um-um," he said, getting his start slowly, "it was thirty-odd years ago and I was scant 24. I was a young printer and it was my business to know how to spell. I had the knack besides, and nobody in the whole community could stand up with me except a long-legged chap who had been in the town a year or so. He was a book agent, and a nice enough fellow, only he was stuck on himself and thought all the girls were, too. As for me, I couldn't do anything much but stick type and spell, and I was so thundering bashful that the girls had no use for me except to have fun with me, and make me wish they had all been born boys or birds, or anything but girls. All but one—that was Alice Smith, who was so good, and so nice to everybody that she couldn't have been otherwise to me if she had wanted to be. And I returned her kindness by thinking of her all day and dreaming of her at night, and blushing clear back to my collar button every time I saw her. Of course everybody knew about it, and everybody, except Alice, teased me about it."

The old subscriber grinned in remembrance.

"I went to Sunday school in those days," continued the editor, "where Alice taught, and she often cornered me and talked to me in spite of myself, just because she was sorry for me. Sometimes she would make me walk home with her from the church, and although I stumbled along like a blind mule and got as red as a beet whenever we met anybody, I would rather have been with her than anywhere on earth. All I could say to her was 'yes' and 'no,' but she laughed and chatted with me as if I were really worth her while and she intended to make a man of me or die in the attempt. But I was mighty near hopeless, and after I left her at the gate I slipped back into town down an alley, for fear of meeting people. But I appreciated what she was doing, as poorly as I was showing it, and though with small opportunities I was a fool, I think, with great ones, I could have been a hero for her sake. At the same time, long-legged Nat Landers, with his smooth tongue and his courage, had me nearly crazy, because he had taken a fancy to Alice and was hanging around her whenever he got the chance, which was a good many times, for Alice liked him and was quite proud that he paid more attention to her than he did to any of the other girls."

"If you got any of that excelsior to spare I'd like a bite," said the taxpayer to the old subscriber who had opened a package of fine-cut chewing tobacco.

"I should think it was like dessert to you after eatin' that long green," grunted the old subscriber, kindly handing the package over to him.

"Well," resumed the editor, "things stood that way when the great spelling bee came off and everybody in the town was there. Of course, I couldn't escape, and I guess I didn't want to, because as bashful as I was I was proud to be pointed out as the best speller in the county, Nat Landers to the contrary notwithstanding. The bee consisted of various tests, individual, and choosing sides and that sort, but the feature of the occasion was a prize oil painting in a gilt frame that was to go to the best speller in the final contest, when every person in the house, except the teacher, was to line up on one side or the other and spell down. As might have been expected, Nat Landers was captain of one side and I was captain of the other, and we soon had our sides marshaled against each other. I wanted to choose Alice the very first one, but I wouldn't have done it for the world, and Nat did it as easy as he could sell a book. And it wasn't because Alice was such a good speller, either. Alice's spell was of a different kind."

"Huh," snickered the Exchange Fiend, who was conversant with the comic columns of the newspapers.

The Editor smiled and went on with his story: "The teacher had a McGuffey's and a Webster's spelling-book, and he began at the beginning where the words were easy and the poorest spellers could have some sort of a show. This act of mercy was of short duration, however, and the teacher was soon over among the hard words, and the victims began dropping all along the line. A dozen or more still stood and battled nobly, but one by one they joined those gone before, until no one was left except Landers and myself. By this time I was getting pretty nervous. All along I had been looking at the picture, and I had made up a dozen little speeches I intended to say to Alice when it was mine, for I had no wish to win the prize, except to give it to her. She had been spelled down early in the fray, for, as I said, Alice never was a star speller, but that was not what I was loving her for, and I didn't care a continental if she couldn't spell cat, if she would only let me love her, and some day—but I was afraid to think of that—win her for myself. Now I was so nervous I couldn't look at the picture, and as for looking at Alice, I didn't care so much as to turn my eyes toward the other side of the room where she sat looking at both of us, but I could see Nat smiling over at her and grinning confidently every time he rattled off a big word as easy as saying 'Jack Robinson.'"

"I don't seem to remember any Jack Robinson," said the Old Subscriber, absent-mindedly, as he looked inquiringly in the direction of the Taxpayer, who shook his head in warning.

"Finally," continued the Editor, "the teacher gave up the spelling-book and opened the big dictionary. It was a silent tribute to our ability that called for a murmur of applause all over the house.

"'Abracadabra,' he called out for a starter, and Nat took it on the fly without trying.

"'Apagoge,' he next announced, and I finished it promptly.

"'Asyndeton.'

"Nat spelled it without turning a hair.

"'Aurora borealis.'

"It was my turn, and the hot blood flew to my face and my knees trembled. Lord knows what was the matter with me, but the place seemed to be whirling, and all I could see was a girl's face swinging around in the jumble before me. I felt my Adam's apple coming into my mouth, but I choked it back with a gasp, and began spelling very slowly, syllable by syllable.

"'A-u,au,r-o,ro,auro,r-a,ra, aurora; b-o, bo, r-e, re, bo-re—' and there I stumbled and stopped, and the house became very still. Nat Landers stood looking at me with a smile on his handsome face, which, to me, was little short of fiendish. One of the ghoulish glee kind, you know.

"'Go on,' said the teacher, lifting his eyes over his spectacles, and letting them fall on me in mild surprise. 'You have only a half minute to a word.'

"'A-u,au,r-o,ro, r-a, ra, aurora; b-o, bo, r-e, re, bo-re—' I proceeded, rather more glibly than on the first trial, but I stopped at the same point again and the teacher looked up and waited for me to go on.

"'Alis,' he suggested, as he could under the rule when a speller was stalled, and he gave the 'a' the short sound as the word was generally pronounced.

"'A-l-i-c-e,' I blurted out, in spite of all I could do, for I knew that was not the way to spell it, and down I sat.

"Landers and the teacher and everybody who knew how to spell the word, because it wasn't a hard one, fairly shouted, and all the others soon joined them, while poor Alice looked at me, blushing and embarrassed, as if she never, never could forgive me for being so outrageously silly. The moment I finished the word Landers caught it up and spelled it right, and I dashed out of the schoolhouse bareheaded, and ran away into the darkness to hide my shame. Of course, everybody after that knew the joke I had put on myself, but nobody had charity enough to see the pathetic side of it and offer me any sympathy. That is, nobody did then, and when Landers had given the picture to Alice, people said it was sure to be a match; but the following Sunday Alice made me walk home with her, and I had suffered so since the spelling bee that some better sense had come to me, and—well," the editor smiled cheerfully and resignedly, "I guess Taxpayer here and Old Subscriber know my wife's name is Alice."

"And a fine woman she is," nodded the Old Subscriber.

"A plumb thoroughbred," corroborated the Taxpayer with confidence.

The Editor bowed, doubled himself up, and again resumed his labors.

Cruelty.

TWO PICTURES.

Wisdom Faithfully Portrays the Drink Demon as He Likes to Appear and as He Really Is.

(Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.—Prov. 23:31-32.)

This text contains an epitome of the whole history of the drink evil. Wisdom concisely and vividly sets before us two word pictures that graphically portrays, first the Drink Demon, with sparkling eye and witching countenance, arrayed in garments of attractive beauty and posing in the most enticing and graceful movements, drawing after her in mad infatuation the multitudes who heed not the warning cry of "Look not thou."

* * * * * * *

The second picture reveals the Drink Demon unmasked. What a shocking contrast! Instead of the fair creature smilingly beckoning us on, we unconsciously recoil from the writhing, insidious monster that thrusts its head from the pool of sin, and would strike its poison fangs into our flesh and send the deadly virus coursing through our veins, bringing palsy and death. Surely it is not a pleasant picture to look upon, for as one gazes, fascinated by its very awfulness, he sees passing in kaleidoscopic review in the glittering bead-like eyes of the unmasked Drink Demon, the wrecked homes, the heartbroken wives, the starving children, the poorhouses, asylums, hospitals, jails and a black cloud of wretchedness, depravity, lust and crime let loose from the very pit of hell.

* * * * * * *

Can it be that these two pictures are companion pieces? Has not Wisdom intensified and heightened the coloring of the pictures? How often in gazing on a brilliant landscape scene, in which the vivid colorings of the sky overhead and the hill and dale beneath, covered with luxuriant verdure, and the sparkling stream coursing down to the sea seemed overdrawn, we have said: "I never saw such vivid lines." Probably not, for though having eyes, we have not beheld the wondrous beauties that have been revealed to the sensitive perception of the faithful artist. So Wisdom, with unclouded vision, penetrates the disguise of the Drink Demon and beholds what is withheld from our own eyes because we are blinded by our own conceits and lusts. Having eyes we see not. Let Wisdom out of the Book of books be eyes for us and speak wondrous things to us.

* * * * * * *

Wisdom sees the beginning and the end; the first step taken in thoughtless, careless fascination, and the last staggering plunge over the precipice of unbridled appetite and lust. There may be years between the two experiences. But Wisdom, with unerring vision, beholding that young man, that young woman, with the sparkling wine glass in the uplifted hand, looks down the years of indulgence and sees that the enticing cup has become the enslaving curse, and the Drink Demon, disguise no longer necessary, with hissing glee casts aside the mask and coils about its victim for the last crushing squeeze and deadly sting.

* * * * * * *

"Look not thou." What harm can a look do? I want to see if it does sparkle, if it giveth its color in the cup and moveth itself enticingly. "Look not thou," says Wisdom. A look means a taste, a taste means a passion, and sin when it is finished bringeth forth death. Pope says:

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

"Look not thou," for "at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

Moderate Drinking.

The dictum of science, then, on the subject of moderate drinking is by no means ambiguous. Science cannot support the plea that alcohol is a harmless pleasant beverage. It cannot support the plea of the moderate drinker that alcohol is an aid to health. But it does support the position of the total abstainer with an emphasis which it is culpable to disregard. Science shows how the abstainer can do more and better work than the moderate drinker. Science shows how the abstainer lives longer and is healthier than the moderate drinker. Science, in short, shows that the abstainer lives the normal life while the moderate drinker lives the abnormal.—Thomas Fastson, M. D., in Health.

HEREDITARY ALCOHOLISM.

Careful, Scientific Study Shows That It Is Present in Over 80 Per Cent. of All Inebriates.

A careful study of many cases by various observers shows that heredity is the most prominent cause and is present in over 80 per cent. of all inebriates. Another active factor, more apparent and controllable in the problem of inebriety, is that of marriage. At present the indiscriminate marriages are largely influential in intensifying and continuing the alcoholic stream. Criminals, paupers, inebriates and others notoriously far down on the road to dissolution are permitted to marry and raise children freighted with a truly frightful legacy of degeneration. It is this defective heredity increased and intensified by marriages with equally bad stock that is the great fountain spring from which inebriety comes. Alcohol, of all other drugs, seems to intensify and provoke disease and the most favorable conditions for the destruction of cell and nerve force.

Heredity leaves a feebleness of these centers, with often a strong predisposition for alcohol, which may remain dormant, only to come into great activity upon taking the first glass of spirits. Injury and disease may be followed by the derangement of these higher brain centers, and the narcotic action of alcohol affords a grateful and seductive relief.

The study of alcoholic cases shows that over two-thirds of all inebriates have a history of previous degeneration both of the brain and nervous system before spirits were first used. The largest proportion of these cases come from alcoholic, insane, consumptive and other neurotic ancestors. The remainder have a marked history of disease, injury, brain strains, shocks and states of profound exhaustion, from which they have apparently recovered, although followed by the use of spirits.

Persons with such a history show great susceptibility to the action of alcohol. The effects are grateful and as pronounced as opium when it quiets the painful nerve. The first action of alcohol quickening the brain circulation, then slowing it, numbing and paralyzing the sensory centers, giving the impression of comfort and approach to health that the victim is unable to correct. The use of alcohol is quickly followed by a train of degeneration that is always concealed in the early stages and is unrecognized by the victim and often by his friends.

The disease of inebriety is clearly associated with criminality. In both a progressive degeneration of the higher moral centers of the brain goes on with a steady decline of all brain vigor and health. No other drug is known to science which has so prominent an influence over the highest and last formed elements of brain force and structure. No other part of the brain is so quickly damaged and diseased by alcohol and concealed by delusions of the senses. —Dr. T. D. Crothers, in Union Signal.

MAYOR WARS ON ALCOHOL.

Chief Magistrate of Lyons, France, Seeks to Curb Intemperance of His City.

Dr. Angagneur, who is mayor of Lyons, France, as well as a professor in a college, has issued a drastic order prohibiting the establishment of all new public houses within 250 yards of a cemetery, school, church or other religious building. The reasons for this order he gives in these words:

"When I was elected mayor of Lyons I was struck by the great number of public houses in the town. There are no fewer than 5,600, and that means one for every 80 inhabitants or for every three houses, and every day we receive applications to be allowed to open more.

"I resolved to stop the growing wave of alcoholism, and I sought some means of preventing the creation of new public houses. I found it in the law of 1880, which contains an article stating in substance that the mayor of a town, after consulting the municipal council, can refuse to authorize the creation of public houses within 250 yards of religious edifices, schools and cemeteries.

"We have, as you know, recently voted the suppression of the octroi taxes and their replacement by an increase in the cost of public house licenses.

"In addition to preventing the increase of new public houses we have found in the law of 1880 the means of compensating to some extent the present proprietors of cafes and wine shops, for in prohibiting the opening of new houses we render their property more valuable.

"In the decision which I have taken the members of the council are unanimously with me. The measure has nothing to do with politics, but is issued entirely in the interest of the public health. The population of Lyons has no illusion on the subject and is with us heart and soul."

A Doctor's Testimony.

Since I abandoned alcohol in surgery I have not had a bad, prolonged, or fatal case of shock. In this very condition, a few years ago, it was considered the remedy par excellence. Now, in a death from shock following a surgical operation, where alcohol has been liberally administered, I should consider it well to inquire whether the alcohol had not been instrumental in causing the death. I believe, as a rule, surgery will be more successful, by a large percentage, without the employment of alcohol.—Dr. Charles D. Davis, Chicago.

THE PEANUT PLANT.

It Is a Member of the Legume Family and First Cousin to the Bean and the Pea.

The peanut differs so much in appearance from the bean and pea, and is put to such different use that it is seldom thought of as a legume. A study of the growing plant immediately shows the resemblance. It is a straggling, more or less trailing annual, with leaves characteristic of the legumes, and the butterfly-shaped blossoms, whose ovaries develop into a seed pod. As the flower withers the stock or spike of the ovary rapidly lengthens and pushes into the ground, so that the pod is matured beneath the surface. Peanuts are widely grown throughout our southern states and are used extensively in that section as a food for hogs. The illustration, here reproduced, from a bulletin of the United States department of agriculture, shows the different parts of this plant.—Orange Judd Farmer.

THE PEANUT PLANT.

THE ROAD TO FAILURE.

Farmers Who Don't Get Out of the Rut and Stick to Antiquated Ideas Surely Are on It.

The more a wagon runs in a rut the deeper the rut grows and the more difficult it becomes for the driver to get out of it. There are hundreds of farmers in ruts, so to speak, and each year seems to weaken their power or thwart their desire to get out. The farmer who for 15 or 20 years has been growing corn and oats alternately on what he mistakenly thinks inexhaustible soil is in a deep, well-worn rut that slopes toward hard times for that farmer. He ought to get out and travel on a smooth surface. He ought to grow more crops and live stock. He should grow cowpeas and soy beans, rape and sorghum, clover and vetch. What will he do with them? Feed them right on the farm.

Oats and corn have their place in a rotation of farm crops, but a great many farms in the middle west would be much improved if given a rest from these fertility leaches. Leguminous and forage crops must supplant cereal crops to a large extent in the corn belt. The land demands the change. Good farming approves it. Farmers must get out of the rut or be mired. The latter will be their lot if they continue the two-crop system which they so long have been practicing. To avoid it is quite as easy as to encounter it.

Without suggesting a complete programme, let us urge that you sow some cowpeas and soy beans this year. Double disk some of your oat land as soon as the crop is harvested, harrow it well and drill in the peas or beans. At last cultivation of corn sow about ten pounds of clover seed per acre broadcast amongst the stalks. Try ten acres this way. Sow some rape. Try some vetch. Get more live stock on your farm. Feed them on those good things herein mentioned. Keep some good cows. Raise poultry. Grow fruit. Have several hives of bees. Be a real farmer and get out of the ruts.—Farmers' Voice.

Feeding Calves on Skimmilk.

Prof. D. H. Otis, of Kansas, in an address delivered before the Missouri State Dairymen's association, said: A dairyman's herd of skim milk calves is a very good index as to the character of the man. Experience of both the experiment stations and up-to-date dairy farmers shows that calves fed warm sweet skim milk, in clean buckets, with access to corn or Kaffir corn meal, bright hay, fresh clean water, salt, plenty of sunlight, shelter and bedding in cold weather, shade in summer, regularity, thoughtfulness and kindness in treatment, will usually be thrifty and gain from one and one-half pounds to two pounds daily. The dairyman who is unable to do this is behind the times and usually behind in his accounts. In other words, he is a scrub dairyman.

Squash Unknown in Europe.

Squashes are practically an unknown luxury in Great Britain. Like the sweet potato, they are not grown and their importation never has been seriously attempted. The department of agriculture intends to make a number of trial shipments of next season's crop of Boston, Marrow and Hubbard squashes, as it is believed the vegetable will be a favorite. Secretary Wilson hopes, he says, to see eventually a good export trade built up both in England and on the continent for each of these American products.

Spanish Politeness.

In a recent book of Spanish travel—"Spanish Highways and Byways"—the writer speaks appreciatively of the courtesy extended to her at a time when the remembrances of the war between her own country and Spain were still recent and acute.

No insults were offered her, nor even a rude word uttered against her. On the contrary, she was the recipient of constant courtesies and kindnesses, and sometimes a solicitude for her comfort and welfare was displayed which embarrassed her.

At San Lucar a pleasing incident occurred. She entered a small shop to make a necessary purchase. The proprietor declined to sell, deeming his wares unsuited to her requirements, and bade his son conduct her to a more fashionable store.

He had guided her thither, as well as to more important points of interest, and on her proffering a requital in money, he bowed with smiling ease and said: "I do not take pay for pleasure, madam!"

Willing to Pay Any Price.

Very few people are willing to pay more than the manufacturers' price for any article even though it be remarkably good, like Palmer's Lotion. Such was not the case with Mrs. Martha M. Johnson, of Derby, Connecticut, who wrote: "Please to send me some of your Lotion. I am willing to pay any price for it, for I have heard it highly extolled and seen its wonderful effects." This proves Palmer's Lotion as nearly priceless as any remedy can be. If your druggist doesn't have, it send to Solon Palmer, 374 Canal street, New York, for samples of Palmer's Lotion and Lotion Soap.

STRANGE HEADDRESS.

The Well-to-Do Women of Bosnia Wear Hats of Extraordinary Shape and Construction.

Not many travelers go to Bosnia, but there is a young man in a large Berlin millinery establishment who had the good fortune to go there a few weeks ago, and who has now returned to the German capital with a curious memento of his journey. At first he thought the country rather dull, but one day, as he was strolling through Srebrenica, near the Servian border, he saw an object in which he at once became deeply interested.

This was a cap, or hat, of extraordinary shape and construction, and it was worn by a comely farmer's wife. The German followed the woman at a respectful distance, and the more he studied her strange headgear the more his instincts as a sartorial artist convinced him that by a little deft manipulation and a proper arrangement of colors it could be transformed into a hat that would delight the most fastidious lady in Berlin.

That very evening, therefore, he obtained a sample cap and examined it closely. He found that its foundation was of straw, and that on it was built an amazing and gorgeous superstructure of cocks' and peacocks' feathers. In front, too, was a small framed mirror and round it were several silver coins and two of gold.

Next day he made further inquiries and learned that sometimes the foundation is an ordinary fez instead of straw; that an embroidered kerchief is invariably worn with the cap, falling down from it at the back, so as to protect the neck, and that the headgear was introduced from Servia in Bosnia about 20 years ago. What surprised him most, however, was to learn that it is only married women who wear this cap, and that it is their fixed rule to strip it of all its feathers after they are married one year, and thenceforth to wear only the foundation of straw or a plain fez.

With three or four Bosnian caps carefully packed in bandboxes he returned to work, and now his firm is anxiously debating whether it would be possible to model from this picturesque headgear hats that would commend themselves to the fashionable women of Berlin.

REMOVING GREASE.

Gasoline Usually Does the Work, But Where It Is Ineffective Chloroform May Be Used.

Ordinary grease spots yield readily to gasoline and clean cloths. Put a layer of clean cloths under the spot and rub it repeatedly with a cloth dipped in the gasoline; as the cloth becomes discolored, change it. Finally air the spot, and it will be found eradicated. When a little liquid grease has been poured over cloth and hardened there, it is more difficult to take the spot out, but with patience this may be done. The goods on which the grease is hardened must be first steamed until hot and the grease melted. It must then be cleansed out. Chloroform is a very good cleaner, if gasoline does not do the work. To apply the chloroform, dip a clean cloth in it and rub the spot quickly. Take care not to breathe the chloroform, but hold the head away, and do the work in a room with the windows open. Keep the grease melted in the cloth by steaming it often, and lay a thickness of clean cloth under the spot while it is being rubbed. Gasoline can be applied in the same way as chloroform. It is wise to keep the windows open when using gasoline, because the cloth must be kept hot while cleansing, and the fumes of the gasoline cannot be allowed to reach near the fire.—N. Y. Tribune.

FOR CRAMPED QUARTERS.

A Convenient and Economical Way of Getting a Washstand Out of a Living Room.

A washstand is a very ugly thing to have in the bachelor girl's cramped quarters. Occasionally the closet is large enough so that it may be accommodated there, but when such is not the case, the following is a most convenient, simple and cheap device: Get a carpenter to fasten with strong brackets to the inside of the closet door a rounded shelf. A hole must be made near the front edge large enough so that the washbowl may be set firmly into it. A thin strip of wood about an inch and a half wide should be nailed to the outer edge of the shelf, and the device is complete. The tooth mug, soap dish and other toilet articles are prevented by the strip from any danger of falling. A towel rack may be fastened to the door above the shelf. The modern pitchers of light metallic ware are particularly desirable.—Coral Wheaton, in Good Housekeeping.

Beyond.

Never was there a cloud which has not passed,
A storm, however long, which did not cease,
And though our way be darkly overcast
By sorrow's shade, beyond is sure release;
As sure as that God lives for aye and aye,
If only we keep on our steady way.
—Antoinette Van Hoesen, in Harper's Bazar.

THE figure above is that of a street-singing girl of Japan. In coloring, the headdress should be left white. Tint the drumhead dull yellow, and the gown, which is of soft silk, should be done in an even tone of dark gray blue. The embroidery on the skirt do in yellow; a straw color for the sandals. Above, make the blossoms pink, the limb of the tree greenish brown. White would be the best for the lanterns. Paint the vase dark red, with yellow flowers and green stems. This will produce a very pretty effect.

The background may be left white or tinted a solid blue, dark at the right and shading off very pale back of the figure of the girl. Mount the finished picture on a cardboard and cut out the oval, in which a photograph may be fixed.—Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

WESTERN CANADA'S DECEMBER WEATHER EQUAL TO THAT OF MAY IN MINNESOTA.

To the Editor:

Thomas Regan and C. Collins, of Eden Valley, Minnesota, went out to Western Canada last December as delegates, to look over the grazing and grain lands that are being offered at such low prices and reasonable terms. This is what they say:

"We arrived in Calgary about the 20th December and although we had left winter in Minnesota and Manitoba, we were surprised to find beautiful warm weather at this point, quite equal to what we have in May in Minnesota. There was no snow nor trace of winter to be seen, and the climate was really splendid. Horses, cattle and sheep were running out, in prime condition, with plenty of feed on the prairie, and really better than that of ours stabled in the south. We are impressed with this country as one of the finest mixed farming countries we have ever seen. The immense tracts of fertile lands, well sheltered and abundantly watered, leave nothing to be desired.

Leaving Alberta we returned east and visited the Yorkton district in Assiniboia. We drove out about ten miles at this point and were highly pleased with the splendid samples of grain we were able to see, wheat yielding 25 bushels, oats 60 bushels. Roots were also good specimens. From what we have seen, we have decided to throw in our lot with the Yorktoners—satisfied that this part of the country will furnish good opportunities for anyone anxious to make the best of a really good country. Any agent of the Canadian Government, whose advertisement appears elsewhere in the columns of your paper will give you full particulars of the new districts being opened out this year in Assiniboia and Saskatchewan.

Yours truly,
OLD READER.

An Ungrateful World.

Literature of Angling.

"John," said a prominent citizen of Punxsutawney to his hired man, "I am going to the mountains to fish for trout a couple of weeks, and I want you to get my tackle and supplies in shape. Use the shortest sentence in the language containing all the letters of the alphabet formula."

"Yes, sir."

For the information of those who are not fishermen and may not be familiar with the shortest sentence in the language containing all the letters in the alphabet it may be well to quote the sentence. It is this:

"Pack my box with four dozen liquor jugs."—Punxsutawney Spirit.

A Tempting Offer.

A recent issue of a musical journal published at Leipsic, Germany, contained the following curious advertisement: "Wanted—A skilled musician, who can compose before warm weather begins a tragic opera in one act. The author of the libretto will place at the disposal of the composer a house, which is furnished with a piano and which is situated near the sea in a most idyllic and romantic country; furthermore, the composer will be well fed and supplied with all necessary fuel. A poor but gifted artist ought to be able to make his fortune in a place like this and under conditions such as are here proposed. Those who apply for the situation are requested to send biographical notices of themselves to the office of this paper."—N. Y. Sun.

Author and Census.

Apropos of the census, a well-known author got into trouble with the man who called for his "return" last Monday. The final column of the paper says that you are to "write the precise infirmity, if any, opposite the name of the person, and if the infirmity dates from childhood add 'from childhood.'" Under this heading my friend put "authorship," and the census man spent some time arguing with him that authorship was not an infirmity. "You try it and you'll know better," said my friend. "I'll put measles there if you don't go away." And the census man went away, still grumbling.—London Express.

Remarkable Power.

A dear old lady was taken one day to a musical service in a Boston church. She had heard much about the fine voice of the soprano, and was prepared for a treat.

She sat in rapt enjoyment until the service was over, and then turned a radiant face toward her escort, who was a young grandson.

"Dear boy," she said, "you've given me a great treat. Her voice is perfectly beautiful. It made cold chills run all up and down my spine."

"It's too bad, grandmamma," said the boy, "but she didn't sing to-day, though she was there. The gentleman next me says she's been suffering from a bad cold, and one of the chorus had to sing the solos for her."

"What, dear?" said the old lady, looking momentarily distressed. Then her face cleared, and she patted his arm reassuringly.

"Never you mind," she said. "We can come again some time; but after all, if she can make me feel that way without singing, I don't know as 'twould be wise for me to hear her, now would it?"

Newspaper Frauds.

"Non-partisan" papers, edited by partisans, are the most patent humbugs of the age. In commenting upon public matters they start out non-partisan, but wind up partisan. They are simply frauds. A partisan paper is the more to be admired. It sacrafices patronage for principle. It is more honest, for it does not play for both sides, and does not pretend to be anything than partisan. There is nothing antagonistic to honesty in being partisan, and there is every inducement to dishonesty in being non-partisan or independent. The most despicable object is a partisan who pretends to conduct a non-partisan or independent paper, and then by his acts endorses every principle and policy which his party espouses.—Westminster (Md.) Advocate.

MEMORIAL Day in passing years has grown more significant. It means a tribute to many thousands more than twelve months ago, and the gray headed men who march to the cemetries all over the United States are fewer in number and feebler in movement. The memorial to those who fell in battle is now a memorial to many of those who survived the conflict. With the gallant men of the sixties are lying men of the nineties who also fell for the flag they love so well. Bare patriotic men they all were, and their valor is the common heritage of us all. This is one country, again and one forever, therefore let it pause to drop a wreath on the graves of the nation's dead.

THE safe return to the Capital of President and Mrs. McKinley is a matter of which the nation will rejoice, while deeply regretting the unfortunate circumstances that cut short their trip. The disappointment of the many thousands residing along that part of the route that was abandoned is keen, but it is softened by the sympathy for the President. The trip in as far as it was taken, indicates that the people everywhere admire him and no matter whatever differences of opinion might exist upon national questions all conceded the good intentions, honesty and ability of the President, and gladly joined in doing him honor. It is to be hoped that some future day the President will be able to complete the trip, for it is a pleasure to the people to see and hear him talk, and is benefiting to the President himself by giving him a closer and wider view of the country.

The Tramp Question.

When the tramp learns there is nowhere he can turn his footsteps that he will not find a constable awaiting him, to send him to the rock pile or to work on the public highway, he will begin to think seriously of mending his ways. It is only within the past half century that the tramp problem has existed in this country; but during that time it has grown great. There are now many thousands of the genius prowling, robbing, assaulting and burning in all of the States. Their laziness and crimnality is proverbial and monumental. Kansas farmers are now advertising for farm laborers for the wheat harvest, at $2 per day, but no tramps are applying. They do not want work. They proceed upon the principle that the world owes them a living, and if they cannot get it by begging they will steal it. And in this they are to a considerable degree encouraged by those who do not like to turn anyone hungry away from their doors. In short, there is too much leniency towards the tramp; and this considerateness is often repaid with raids upon the hen roosts and smokehouses, or assaults upon women and children when the farmer husbands and brothers are away in the fields.

The tramp evil is one that requires heroic treatment, for it is growing. At isolated homes about the only effective preventive is the shotgun and the dog, accompanied by the stony-hearted determination that the tramp shall have no food except such as he renders an equivalent in labor for. In municipalities the officers of the law ought to have the authority—and be required to use it—to immediately grab all tramps and put them to work in the chaingang, the workhouse, on the highways or elsewhere. Nearly all of them are able-bodied. If they can earn their own livelihood but won't do it because they are too lazy, they ought to be made to do it.

Mr. Bryan Attacks the Supreme Court.

Perhaps the most conclusively convincing sign that William J. Bryan is unfitted for the duties of a great party leader is his evident inability to adjust himself to any overpowering trend of public thought and action. It is very good to endeavor to instruct the people as to what he considers the wisest modes of conduct before the decisive has passed, but to place himself in the direct path of public movement is to invite disaster both for himself and any party that he may dominate. And, truly, Mr. Bryan appears fated for just such a political martyrdom.

The silver standard he still retains at hand, although wiser friends have induced him to refrain from flaunting it so conspicuously before the public. Now, he seems to be strongly inclined to raise and navigate that ill-fated political derelict—opposition to the very existence of the Supreme Court. It cannot be encouraging to the well-wishers of this politician to remember that some really gifted men have staked their political all upon this same venture and lost accordingly.

Still, this is not a new democratic doctrine and has, perhaps, kept more able men from the democratic ranks than any other doctrine of the party founded by Jefferson. It must be apparent to all unblinded by partisan prejudice that former political alignments played no part in the recent judgments of the Supreme Court. Yet, this proof that politics was absolutely laid aside by these nine eminent jurists is of no consequence to Mr. Bryan and his party. If the decision had gone the other way and the administration had proposed changing the status of the Supreme Court the volume of eloquence issuing from Mr. Bryan would have been stupendous.

Yet the objects of his efforts is a great curtailment in the power of the judicial branch of the National Government. This the Democrats would transfer to Congress, since they may, at least, hope to control both houses and the Presidency at the same period. This control once gained, only the watchful influence of the supreme judicial tribunal of the nation could safeguard the constitution from their attacks. For this is the real object of their political hatred, and since no body of jurists has been found willing to read this sacred document in the perverted way that they desire—they would remove the court that has ever barred their pathway. Yet, there is little danger that William J. Bryan can accomplish what Jefferson and Patrick Henry found impossible of execution. These men were giants intellectually, and in venturing in their political footprints Mr. Bryan is apt to disappear forever from public view.

Good Roads Argument.

The Postoffice Department is trying to use the rural free delivery experiment as an argument in favor of good roads, and where the experiment has failed to improve the bad roads along the routes the service will have to be abandoned.

The department has gone over the records to see how many routes were interrupted by the condition of the roads last spring and has sent out notices that unless the roads are improved to prevent similar interruption this spring those routes will have so be abandoned. The records show that a great many routes were interrupted from one to seven days last spring.

There were 40 of these routes in Iowa, 12 in Illinois, 10 in Wisconsin and a less number in other western and southern states. The record against Iowa is not so bad as it seems because that State has a great many more rural free delivery routes than any other State, and, like Illinois, the State suffers at times from bad roads which cannot be improved.

The department admits that it will have to give some consideration to the difficulty in building roads in Iowa and Illinois, where the depth of the soil makes it almost impossible to construct roads that will be passable at all seasons of the year. It is admitted that there are routes in Illinois and Iowa where everything possible has been done to make good roads, and they have excellent roads for the greater part of the year, but during the spring freshets these may be impassable for a few days.

The order is meant to apply to those routes where the people are indifferent to the condition of the roads and have allowed them to become impassable through neglect. The inspectors will report on the routes that are interrupted this spring, and where the interruption is due to neglect of the roads they will be abandoned. Where the interruption is due to conditions which cannot be overcome the department will make allowances and continue the service.

But the department regards rural free delivery as an argument and an inducement to build good roads, and wherever the people are indifferent to the advantages of the service the department holds that the experiment is a failure. The demand for rural free delivery is greater than the department can meet with the appropriation by Congress, and it will favor those communities which show most appreciation by building roads over which the government can send mails with the least possible interruption.

Resolutions of Respect.

At a regular meeting of Mt. Division Lodge No. 267, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God, the Ruler of the Universe, to remove from our lodge by the hand of death our dearly beloved brother, Charles C. Wolf; and

WHEREAS, It is but just that a fitting recognition of his many virtues should be had; therefore, be it

Resolved, By the lodge that, while we bow in humble submission to the Most High, we do not the less mourn and sympathize with the bereaved widow and many friends for our dearly departed brother; and

Resolved, That in the death of Charles C. Wolf the lodge mourns the loss of a brother who was ever ready to proffer the hand of aid and the voice of sympathy, not only to those of the fraternity but all mankind—a citizen whose upright and honest life should be a standard of emulation; and

Resolved, That the charter of this lodge be draped for thirty days; and

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the records of the lodge and a copy be presented to the widow, also a copy be sent to each of the city papers.

Died.

WOLF.—At the residence of his mother, Mrs. Jane Wolf, on Third street, Oakland, on Friday last, after an illness of several months of consumption, Charles C. Wolf, aged about thirty years. The young man was a great sufferer for a long time, having been a sufferer twice from an attack of typhoid fever within the past two years which ultimately culminated in consumption. His home was at Keyser, W. Va., where he was first taken ill. Some weeks ago he was brought to Oakland, his friends thinking the change would be beneficial, but the disease had developed to such an extent that nature could not recuperate and the services of physicians were of no avail, except probably to prolong the struggle for life. The deceased leaves a widow and one little child, besides his mother, two brothers and a sister. He was a member of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen of Cumberland, and up to the time of his illness was employed by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad as a freight brakeman. His funeral took place on Monday at Keyser, the interment being made in the Keyser cemetery.

KILDOW.—Mrs. Hopwood Kildow, of near Oakland, died on Friday last after a short illness of typhoid-pneumonia. The deceased lady was the mother of a number of children. Her funeral took place on Sunday.

Any Old Price For Books.

At the recent meeting of the Maryland State Board of Education held in Baltimore the most important topics discussed included a new school course for the county schools and the methods of purchasing school books by the various school boards of the counties. The present course of study followed in the schools of the counties is antiquated and to bring the subject generally before the public a free discussion through these colums is invited. At the meeting of the board it transpired that some of the text books were sold to the different counties at various prices and discounts, and that, for example, one county got 16⅔ per cent. discount on the price paid, while another county; for the same books, at the some price procured 20 per cent. discount.

The board was also advised that bids were not properly advertised, and that contracts were very often renewed with the same firm. The question caused considerable discussion, and it was decided, as the State furnished the money for the books, to ascertain if the board could take any action in the matter.

MRS. M'KINLEY STILL CRITICALLY ILL.

No Material Change in Her Condition.

WASHINGTON, June 4.—While Dr. Rixey was slightly more hopeful in his talk tonight, Mrs. McKinley's condition cannot be said to show any material change. It has been decided not to hold consultations more than once a day unless a material change for the worse should occur, and that the only bulletin to be issued shall be one following the usual forenoon consultation. Surgeon General Sternberg called at the White House during the evening.

Among those who called to manifest their sympathy and make personal inquiries as to Mrs. McKinley's condition were Count Cassini, the Russian ambassador; General Miles, Miss Wilson, daughter of the Secretary of Agriculture, who spent some time with the president, and Miss Barber, Postmaster General and Mrs. Smith, Pay Director and Mrs. Rand, of the Navy; Miss Hitchcock, daughter of the Secretary of the Interior; Mrs. A. W. Greely, A. B. White, of Kansas City, and Mrs. J. Stanley Brown. No one was admitted at the White House after 9 o'clock, an hour earlier than the usual time for closing the doors to personal friends. One of the President's visitors tonight said that it was conceeded that Mrs. McKinley was in a very grave condition. There was hope of the outcome, he said, but it was a very slender hope.

Beyond the Crisis.

WASHINGTON, JUNE 5.—President McKinley this evening announced to an intimate friend that he believed the crisis in Mrs. McKinley's illness has been passed and that she would continue to improve. He expressed himself as feeling much encouraged.

Loch Lynn Hotel to Be Opened June 25.

The Loch Lynn Hotel, one of the best hotels on the Alleghany mountains, has recently been purchased by a number of Fairmont people and will be opened on June 25th. This splendid hotel property is situate just opposite Mt. Lake Park, half way between Deer Park and Oakland. The hotel building is large and conveniently arranged, have 100 guest chambers, a very large dining room, the finest ball room on the mountains, large and comfortable offices, writing rooms, etc. The house is to be practically newly plumbed and a number of lavatories and closets to be added. It is to be repainted and the offices, dining room, ball room, etc., decorated. The house is to be newly furnished throughout with the best of furniture. No expense is to be spared to make it the most comfortable and inviting hotel on the mountains. The gentlemen who have it in charge are Col. C. L. Smith, Sam R. Nuzum, Sheriff M. A. Jolliff, C. W. Watson and O. S. McKinney, all of Fairmont. An engineer and plumber, representing Messrs. Baker & Donally, was at Mt. Lake Park last week making estimates on the plumbing and engineering work to supply the house with a plentiful quantity of water. They report no difficulty in this, and new engines and pumps will be ordered at once. Mrs. L. B. C. List, who is one of the best hotel people in the country, will have charge, and she will be given carte blanche in furnishing and equipping the hotel and supplying the table. So it is fair to say that the Loch Lynn Hotel will be a most attractive place this year.

A Frank Advertiser.

A gentleman who has a Christian spirit and a horse for sale advertises as follows in a Minnesota paper:

We have a good family driving horse for sale, providing you carry insurance.

He is not over particular as to feed. In fact, he prefers our neighbor's haystacks and corncribs to our own.

We feed him whenever we can catch him, which is seldom.

He is partly gentle. The other parts are not, and you must govern yourself accordingly.

We will throw in the derrick and telegraph pole combination which we use to hitch him up with.

If you are fond of driving we would advise you to engage a cowboy that owns a fast horse to do your driving, and be sure and get on top of the barn before he begins to drive the horse.

For price and coroner's address apply to the owner.

It is evident that the pernicious doctrines of David Harum have not taken root everywhere. Furthermore, there will be no excuse for a damage suit if this advertiser ever succeeds in disposing of the goods. In view of the present-day greed for gain all this is highly encouraging.

WHEN "Zionist" Dowie asserted himself to be the prophet Elijah, come to earth for the third time, and called on all who believed him to stand up, three thousand presumably sane people rose to their feet and acclaimed him. This was in Chicago but a day or two ago, and yet we send missionaries to open the eyes of the blind and deluded heathens in Asia and Africa. It simply shows how light is the veneer of civilization over the common credulity of human nature.

MARTINS FERRY, O., June 1, 1901.

To the Editor of the Republican.

I thought that your many readers might wish to know something of the city of Martins Ferry where I am now working. It is a town of about 8000 inhabitants and is one of the most hustling little towns I have ever struck in my life. The Aetna-Standard Sheet mill, at which I am working, will be the most complete mill of its kind in the world when improvements now being made are completed. The Laughlin tin plant here is next to the largest of its kind in the world. The plant is composed of 23 mills and arrangements are being made to add several more mills as soon as it can be done. Besides these we have in course of construction a large sheet mill plant which will contain several mills. Then we have two glass factories, two foundries, a shovel works, a tool works, a novelty works and countless other smaller establishments.

The pay roll here amounts to something like $75,000 every two weeks, but when the improvements now being made are completed it will go to something like $100,000. So you see this town is enjoying some of the good old McKinley prosperity that is generally the case all over the country.

The wages here are good. A man can earn any place from the usual wages paid common laborers up to $15 or $18 a day. It is a common thing for rollers in the mills to make ten and twelve dollars every day they work. So you see there is little danger of a man starving to death as long as McKinley is president. Just at present we fellows don't use any lids on our dinner pails as they are so full, and I am proud that I am one of the boys who with their votes helped to bring about this prosperity.

With kindest regards to all the Mountain State boys, I am

Yours truly,
C. H. MARTIN.

At Garthright's.

I have one hundred rolls of matting for sale from 14 to 32 cents per yard; 2 car loads best flour on earth to sell at rock bottom prices; the largest stock of drygoods and notions ever brought to Mountain Lake Park as cheap as can be where quality is considered. I want two car loads of potatoes at 40 cents per bushel, one-half cash, all the butter you can bring me and also all the eggs you have at 14 cents, one half cash. 3t

THE COST OF WARS.

Conflicts of the Past Century Have Cost Nearly $20,000,000,000.

A writer in the Home Magazine estimated the cost of wars of the nineteenth century to nearly reach the enormous sum of $20,000,000,000. Just how much is a billion? he asks. It is one thousand millions; but that fact is not expressive. There are only 3,155,673,600 seconds in a century—that is, six dollars have been spent on war for every second of the century. If we take Archbishop Usher's chronology, and consider the world to be 5,904 years old, we find that the Nations have spent on war during the nineteenth century at the rate of six dollars a minute since the creation.

The most costly building in the world is the Church of San Pietro in Vaticano, known to us as St. Peter's Rome. It has cost not less than $70,000,000 since its foundation stone was laid, yet nearly 300 other churches of equal cost could be built out of what the world has spent on wars during the nineteenth century. The costliest building in this country is the Philadelphia Public building, which represents nearly $30,000,000; yet nearly 700 copies of this great pile could be erected out of the money spent on war during the last hundred years. The world spends upwards of $530,000,000 a year on education. If it spent 37 times as much it would not equal the war expenses of the past century. The population of the world is estimated at 1,500,000,000; the money spent on war between 1801 and 1900 would give each man, woman and child alive today more than $13 as pocket money.

If a man counted 200 a minute for 10 hours a day, six days a week, he would have counted one million in 8 days three hours and 20 minutes. At the same rate he would need 8,333 days, 3 hours and 20 minutes to count one billion, or 26 years, 195 days, 3 hours and 20 minutes not counting Sundays. To count twenty billions would take 532 years, 150 days, 6 hours and 40 minutes.

The Laurel (L. I.) tragedy, in which a young man, crazed by silly village gossip about his love affair, shot the good-natured busybody who "meant no harm" and then killed himself, carries its own moral, which no one who has ever lived in a small community will have any difficulty in interpreting. The wonder is not that it occurred, but that such tragedies are not more frequent.

Mr. Oren F. Morton, of Kingwood, author of "Winning or Losing," came over to Oakland from his home on Friday last and will remain here until his book comes from the press, work upon which will begin this week in THE REPUBLICAN job printing office. There will be one thousand copies issued which will be printed on a laid book paper. The book will contain about 300 pages and a number of half-tone engravings. It will be bound in cloth.

Messrs. Chas. Brown and Ross Compton, of Grantsville, were in Oakland Monday and Tuesday and appeared before the Board of County Commissioners to lay a complaint against the builders of the railroad up the Cassleman Valley. They allege that the railroad as located at present enroaches upon the county road leading from Grantsville to Lonaconing to such an extent that in places it will be impossible for a team and the trains to pass, and that for a considerable distance the county road will have to be relocated and rebuilt, which will require the expenditure of a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars on the part of the county unless the promoters of the railroad can be made to pay the damages. The Commissioners have taken action in the matter and we understand a demand will be made made upon the firm constructing the road to repair all damages and to place the county road in proper condition.

On and after the first of June money orders will only be paid at the office on which drawn. Some time ago the department adopted the plan of paying them anywhere, but this has been found to be impracticable and will be discontinued.

Henry G. Fledderman, of the Maryland census bureau, began paying the enumerators of the State Saturday. All enumerators who have finished their work and returned their books to the department will receive checks in payment.

The old time custom of public officials asking their friends to go on their bonds is out of date and it is seldom done anymore. A responsible man has little trouble to get a solid guarantee company to assume the risk and thus not impose on his personal friends.

Mr. Chas. D. Smith, lately employed as a bookkeeper in the Garrett County Bank, has resigned his position and is now in Baltimore on a visit to relatives. He will shortly return to Oakland and later go to Terra Alta, West Va., where he will practice law.

Col. D. T. E. Casteel left on the early train Saturday morning for Fortress Monroe where he will be examined for a commission in the regular army as a first lieutenant. Advertising may be costly; good advertising never is. The profits of the latter kind—the kind that reaches all the people—are not to be measured alone by the gross receipts of a day or week. Advertising in THE REPUBLICAN may save enough to pay for itself, especially in dry goods, furniture and similar lines, where a description of the goods, the styles and the prices saves the time taken in showing the customer around. Here is a direct saving of time which clearly represents money, to say nothing of the time which is saved to the shopping community.

Freight traffic on the B. & O. is still running light with indications pointing to a heavier movement in a few weeks. However, the regular men are making all the time they want and occasionally taking a vacation, which gives an extra man a chance. Passenger traffic continues good with indications of a handsome and a profitable business through the coming vacation months.

The wool market has opened a little late this year owing to the backwardness of the season. Wool delivered yesterday to buyers in Oakland brought 18 cents per pound, which is the lowest price yet been offered and we may say also the highest The price in bound to rise and we advise our wool producers to hold on to their clip for the advance which will come sooner or later.

A large number of Oaklanders will leave here some time in September for the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo, N. Y. The party will be composed exclusively of married people and will spend some days at the Exposition and at Niagara. The route to the big show has not yet been decided upon, but the party will probably go via Pittsburg and will travel in a special car.

John Bradshaw passed away at an early hour Monday morning at his Valley Falls residence, near Grafton, where he has been recently resi'ing. He was eighty-one years of age. He was for years Baltimore and Ohio supervisor of roads east of the Ohio river, and the last president of the Grafton and Greenbrier before its absorption by the Baltimore and Ohio. The powers of the Valley Fall belonged to him, which is valued at $100,000.

The party from this county going to Nome, Alaska, was joined at Seattle, Washington, by Clarence Compton, son of Ross Compton, Esq., of Grantsville, a day or two after they had arrived there. Dr. Chas. Beachy, who left here with Mr. Nathan and the others, in a letter to the editor from Seattle, says that the party left Seattle for Nome on last Saturday night and that he expects to leave for the same point on the 10th inst.

And now the police of Baltimore have discovered, captured and confiscated a "moonshine" still in the heart of Baltimore which was operated by some Hebrews named May, recent arrivals in that city from a Western State. At the time of the capture a considerable amount of corn "mash" was in the still ready for business. May himself suspected that the police would be after him and left the city. His wife and three children were captured along with the apparatus. What a wierd tale of a bloody battle, knives, revolvers and a bold dash for liberty the city press would have manufactured had the still been found in the mountains of this or an adjoining State. As it was the fact was barely mentioned and without scare-heads at that.

Commissioners' Meeting.

The County Commissioners were in session here for three days this week, adjourning yesterday afternoon, after transacting routine business, passing a number of orders and other matters of minor importance. The members of the board left last night for Piedmont and this morning they will go to Barnum, along the West Virginia line where they will meet the commissioners of Mineral county, West Va., and confer relative to building a new bridge over the Potomac river at Barnum, the present structure being unsafe for passage. The new bridge will be composed of iron.

A Church Celebration.

To mark the beginning of a Jubilee the congregation of St. Peter's Catholic church in Oakland, under the guidance of the pastor, Rev. James E. Connell, last Sunday afternoon at four o'clock paraded about the grounds of the church. The societies of the church, the Knights of St. John and the A. O. H., were in line of march and also quite a large number of ladies and children. The total number taking part in the service was 248.

Census Returns In.

The census returns for this county have been forwarded to Democratic headquarters at Baltimore and the people will be required to foot the bill. The figures from the counties are being safely guarded by the party managers, but enough is known to insure that the representation in the House of Delegates of Maryland will not be increased by an additional member from this county, although it has been generally conceded that if the census had been fair and impartial the returns would have shown that we have over 18,000 citizens. A number of persons are known to have been missed by the enumerators in different sections, particularly in districts bordering on the West Virginia and Pennsylvania lines and the line dividing Garrett and Allegany counties. This being the case all persons who know that they are not on the returns will please report the fact to this office.

Lost a Finger.

Herbert E. Flowers, of Mountain Lake Park, and employed at C. M. Rathbun & Sons' planing mill, Mountain Lake Park, was operating a jointing machine on last Tuesday and his finger coming in contact with the knives it was cleanly cut off. He came to town and had the injury dressed by one of the physicians here.

Ex-County Commissioner Fresh Ill.

We were pained to learn on Tuesday of the very serious illness of ex-County Commissioner Jacob Fresh at his home in New Germany. For several weeks he has been suffering with an attack of sickness and two weeks ago dropsy developed. On Thursday his condition was alarming when Dr. Bevans, who attended him, called into consultation Dr. A. F. Speicher, when heroic efforts were made to relieve the suffering man. The result was that Mr. Fresh rallied and it is now thought that for the present the danger point has been passed. Mr. Fresh has been one of the best citizens of the county and his death will be sincerely regretted by his numerous friends in all sections. We trust, however, that his life may be prolonged for many years to come.

Memorial Day in Oakland.

Memorial Day in Oakland passed off very quietly. In the morning the veterans met at their headquarters and with the band at their head marched again to the cemeteries of Oakland and there decorated the graves of their deceased comrades after which the ritualistic ceremonies were gone through with and the return to the hall where the Post disbanded for the day. Quite a large crowd was present at the cemetery, although the day was overcast and rain threatened almost every minute. Every grave in the cemetries whether that of an old soldier or of a civilian, was covered with the beautiful and fragrant flowers which grow in abundance.

"The Woven Web."

On Thursday and Friday nights of last week a play entitled "The Woven Web," was presented to appreciative audiences in Oakland by home talent. Interspersed with the play a number of specialties were introduced. The proceeds, amounting to $108 will be applied to the fund for the new Catholic church in Oakland now building.

New Store at the Park.

Messrs. Grant and Lee Hayden, sons of Capt. and Mrs. James A. Hayden, will on Monday open a store at the Park and will keep on hand constantly green, staple and fancy groceries. The store will be located in the Hayden building near the Columbian Hotel. The young men are obliging and we hope will be successful as they should be.

$35,000 for Club Preserve.

The famous Duquesne Club of Pittsburg has offered the North Glade Club of Wheeling, W. Va., thirty-five thousand dollars for their hunting and fishing preserves embracing eight hundred acres in Garrett county, near the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The offer, which is being considered but will most likely be declined, is most tempting as the property stands the the North Glade people only about $10,000, of which $8,000 was paid for the land and $2,800 for the club house and other improvements. The North Glade Club is composed of wealthy West Virginians, mostly from Wheeling, and their preserves include the finest trout fishing in the Alleghenies.

Episcopal Convocation.

The Convocation of the Diocese of Maryland will be held in St. Matthew's church, Oakland, June 12 and 13. The services will be as follows:

June 12—8 p. m., evening prayer and short addresses by Rev. J. Koon, Rev. Cornelius Abbott and Rev. J. Yellott.

June 13—9.15 a. m., Holy Communion; 9.30 a. m., business session; 2.30 p. m., essay and discussion; 8 p. m., evening prayer and sermon by Rev. William D. Gould.

All who are interested are invited to be present.

Judge Edward H. Bartlett.

Dr. Edward H. Bartlett, of Oakland, has received his commission from Governor John Walter Smith appointing him Judge of the Orphans' Court for this county vice the late Thomas R. McRobie, deceased, whose death came quite suddenly two weeks ago. Dr. Bartlett has received the congratulations of his many friends here upon his appointment.

Cut Off Two Toes.

Harvey Elliott, of near the Woods' farm, west of Oakland, was engaged last Thursday in cutting some brush with an axe, when the tool glanced from a piece of wood and struck Mr. Elliott on the foot, entirely severing two of his toes. He immediately started for town horseback, the wounds bleeding profusely. On Liberty street back of the depot he fell from the horse, his condition being so weak from loss of blood that he could no longer retain his seat in the saddle. After he fell he was picked up and conveyed the McComas hospital in a wagon where his injuries were dressed. He is doing as well as could be expected.

Childrens' Day Services.

Rev. George I. Uhler, pastor of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church, announces that on Sunday morning at 10.30 o'clock a sermon will be preached for the especial benefit of children and at 7.30 o'clock p. m. services will be conducted in the auditorium of the church by the Sunday school. A cordial invitation is extended to all to attend these services.

Call for Your Letters.

GOIN' BACK.

I've packed my traps and I'm goin' back where the fields are green and broad,
And the colts, with their legs all doubled up, are rollin' on the sod;
They'll smile, I s'pose, when they see me come, and they'll, some of 'em, likely say
They thought I'd forsaken the farm for good the day that I went away—
But let 'em smile—I'm goin' back—I'm sick of the noise and fuss,
Where a couple of dollars count for more than the life of a common cuss;
They'll nobody notice I've went away—if you told 'em they wouldn't care,
But somebody's face'll be full of joy when she greets her boy back there.

I'm goin' back, for I've had my fill—I've saw what there is to see;
The city may still be the place for you, but it's lost its charm for me;
And won't I be lonesome there, you say,
with the people so far apart?
Well, mebby they're few and far between,
but each of 'em's got a heart;
There ain't no hundreds of thousands there to push you around, I know,
Not carin' a cent where you're comin' from or where you're tryin' to go—
For the one that's jostled day after day with never a friend to greet,
There ain't a lonesomer place on earth than the city's crowded street.

I'm goin' back where the dog's asleep on the step by the kitchen door,
With his nose pushed down between his paws—I'm sick of the smoke and roar;
There's money to make where the crowds are thick and they're tryin' to rip things loose—
There's money to get if you've got the grit, but, dang it all! what's the use?
They hustle for dollars all through the day and dream of dollars in bed,
And forgive the gougin' a fellow may do as long as he gets ahead—
They hustle and bustle and coop themselves in dark little holes and fret
And honor a person accordin' to the money he's managed to get.

I'm goin' back where the poplars stand in tall rows down the lane,
Where the bobsled's settin' beside the barn,
defyin' the sun and rain;
Where the birds are singin' away as though they were hired to fill the air
With a sweetness that nobody ever can know who was never a boy out there;
I'm goin' back where they'll not expect me to sit in the kitchen when I'm courtin' the girl I love because I'm workin' for other men—
Where the richest among 'em'll shake my hand, instead of lettin' me see
That they think the money they've got must make them a blamed sight better than me.

I'm goin' back, and you'll stay here and rush, in the same old way,
Goin' to work and then goin' home—the same thing day by day—
And you'll think you're havin' a high old time and I'll pity you, lookin' back (From where I whistle across the fields) at you in the same old track!—
I'm goin' back, but the crowds won't know, and they'll still keep rushin' on;
They'll never notice that some one's face is missin' when I am gone—
No, they'll never notice that some one's gone—if they did they wouldn't care—
But every tree'll be noddin' to me when I turn up the lane back there.
—S. E. Kiser, in Chicago Record-Herald.

Didn't Get the Reward

THE Reformed Messenger Boy took a dirty and time-worn paper from the inside pocket of his vest. He unfolded it and spread it out on the table. It showed the face of a middle-aged man, with a brief description below it. Above the face, in big black letters, was the single line: "$5,000 Reward."

"Dere," said the boy, "is de mug of de guy what me an' 327 got pinched. If it hadn't been fer us de fly cops 'ld a-been lookin' fer him yet. We gits wise to his nobs, an' gives de tip to de flies, an' den dey makes de pinch, cops de coin, an' gives me an' 327 de double cross.

"His name was John Rawlins Glimmer, an' he made a quick sneak out-a New York five years ago, after pinchin' $250,000 from de Newton national bank. De peppers was full of how smood a guy he was. He was de bookkeeper, an' kept de bank dope books, an' he'd been pinchin' an' makin' de books lie about it fer ten years. Every day it was pinch an' carry one wid him, an' in de afternoon he'd go down an' put a few dollars on de ponies, 'spectin' all de time to win out an' put himself back on de square.

"Me an' 327 was readin' all about it, an' wishin' dat we could git a chance to do a little flyin', an' win de dough de bank offers fer catchin' de guy. Den my fren', de lute over to Central, gimme dis bill of de play, wid de guy's mug on it an' tellin' all about him. Me an' 327 learns it all by heart.

"'John Rawlins Glimmer,' it says, '48 years old, red hair and mustach, mixed wid gray. Little finger on right hand is missing. Has big scar on back of neck. When excited is apt to stutter badly. Has taught class in Sunday school, an' may be found takin' part in revival meetin's. $5,000 reward fer his errest an' detention. Left New York June 11, an' is supposed to have come to Chicago.'

"'327,' I says, after him an' me has got de descript down fine, 'me an' you mus' cop dat dough. We mus' keep our lamps lit fer Mr. Glimmer, an' when we sees a guy wid his right mitt shy one finger we'll t'row him down an' look fer de scar on de back of his neck. You'll have to go to Sunday school, 327,' I says, 'an' rubber fer guys wid red hair and mustaches.'

"327 goes de nex' Sunday, an' dere's a big gazaboy dere wid de right color roof on his nut and a red mustache, but he has gray kid gloves on his mitts, an' 327 can't tell whedder he's shy a little finger er not. 327 says dat kid gloves are suspicious, anyhow, so he waits till de guy gets out on de street. Den he sneaks up an' gives him a pinch on the little finger on de right glove, t'inkin' if it was stuffed wid sawdust de guy wouldn't know it. But de guy lets out a yell, and so 327 knows dat he is on a dead 'un. De nex' t'ree Sundays me an' 327 puts in pinchin' red-headed Sunday school teachers what wears kids in de right hand little finger, but dey all yells, an' one of 'em hands 327 a swift kick in de slats, so we knows dey are de real t'ing an' not bank robbers.

"All dis time de peppers is printin' stories about John Rawlins Glimmer. 'Traced to Chicago,' dey said. 'It Is Knowed Dat de Newton Bank Wrecker Cum to Dis City,' 'Offer of Reward Is Doubled,' 'Ten Thousand Dollars fur His Arrest, and Detectives Are Hot on de Trail.'

"De night dat piece cum out in de pepper dere was a telegraph cum from New York to de bigges' fly copper in town. It cum in about midnight an' it read like dis:

"'Octopus, Glimmer, tentacles, Chicago, seven, tempus, catamaran.

"'Eye.'

"'Deliver dis message by special messenger immediately,' it said. 'Spare no pains. Most important.'

"De fly copper de telegraph was fer lives six miles out in de rubarbs, an' de manager calls in me and 327 an' tells us to go over an' git a buggy at de libery stable an' make a hurry-up trip. We goes over an' I stops at de hash foundry to cop some sinkers an' cigs fer lunch on de way. 327 goes ahead to get de horse hitched up.

"When I cums up to de stable 327 ducks out an' leads me into de alley.

"'Say,' he says, shiverin' all over, 'dere's a guy in dere wid red hair, an' his mustache is jes' shaved off. He's wearin' mitts, an' de collar of his coat is turned up to hide de back of his neck.'

"'An' I'll bet,' says 327, 'dat he's de guy we're after. We as good as got him pinched now,' says 327. 'What you goin' to do wid yer $5,000?' he says. 'Glimmer's in dere tryin' to hire a rig to drive him down-town, an' the libery stable guy says he'll have to wait a minute till he gits a driver in; dat all de men are out jes' now, but he's expectin' one back in a minute.

"W-W-WELL, I'LL G-G-GET IT OFF."

"'Who's bossin' de libery to-night?' says I. 'Mike?'

"'Yes.'

"'Tell him dere's a guy wants to see him out here fer a minute.'

"Mike an' me is old pals, an' when he comes out I gits him on to let me put on a driver's coat an' go out wid de guy me an' 327 t'ink is Glimmer. An' I tells 327 to git a quick hustle out with the telegraph to de fly an' to bring de fly back wid him.

"'You call up 16 offis on de telephone frum de fly's house,' I says, 'an' I'll leave word dere fer you what's to do an' where de guy has went.'

"'So I goes in, an' Mike says: 'Here's a driver for you, sir.' An' de guy says: 'Well, hurry up. I haven't got no time to lose.' I takes a piece of red chalk I finds in de stable an' I makes a mark on de back of de guy's coat when he ain't lookin'.

"De n I says to him: 'Excuse me, sir, but you got something on the back of yere coat,' 'Brush it off,' he says, an' I pretended to try, but couldn't make it come. 'It won't come, sir,' I says, 'an' it looks like a big letter in in red paint.'

"'W-w-well, I'll g-g-get it off,' the guy says, an' unbuttons his coat an' starts to pull it off. Then he stops sudden an' pulls it up again around his neck an' says: 'O, well, never mind, I'll change my clothes in de morning, anyhow.'

"By the time Mike gits my cab hitched up 327 is started out fer de fly, goin' out West Thirty-first street like a fire engine, an' it's along towards two o'clock in de mornin'.

"'Where to, sir?' I says, touchin' my hat to de guy.

"'To de Union station in a hurry,' he says. 'I want to catch a train at three o'clock.'

"I gits a hustle over to the West side an' seen my guy safe in lower t'ree in de St. Louis car. Den I calls up 16 offis an' puts de manager wise to the whole show.

"'327 will call you up in a few minutes,' I says, 'an' you tell him an' de fly to catch de train at de Englewood station. Dey got time if dey drive fast. De guy dey want is in lower 'tree in de St. Louis car.'

"De fly and 327 makes a quick run in an' catches de train O. K. at Englewood. De fly walks in and takes John Rawlins Glimmer out of de berth. An' John Rawlins is a rabbit an' gives de hull game away. Den a fly gives 327 a dollar bill an' says: 'Split dat wid your pardner, my boy,' he says, and dat was de nearest we ever came to dat $10,000 reward."—Chicago Tribune.

OUR OLD NEW WORLD.

What Scientific Research Has Shown Regarding the Age of the Western Continent.

Long, long before man was, there were Americans, i. e., beings inhabiting the continents now called the Americas, to which beings great man has given very awful names because mysterious beings must be named appropriately, says a scientific exchange.

The most conservative European savants have to admit that the Americas are many millions of years old. It can't be helped, really. Nowhere is this fact more evident than in the so-called "bad lands" of Dakota and Wyoming. Since 1870 many scientists of repute, like Marsh, Cope, Owen, Wortman, Osborne, visited those regions—where they were called "old-bone men"—and established the fact of the very great antiquity of our continent. They found, for instance, conclusive proof that long ago there were inland seas far exceeding in size the five big lakes, and of which now nothing remains except Salt lake and Sevier lake. Along the shores of these inland seas vegetation luxuriated, and the antediluvian forests of strange-looking trees were the dwelling places of animals more grotesque, more hideous, than even the most fertile brain conceived during the ages when faith in the existence of dragons, etc., was universal, though vague.

The skeletons and portions of skeletons of the monstrous land and water lizards of prehistoric times make it possible to state the size of those terrible animals.

The "Atlantosaurus immanis" had a height of 37 feet and a length of 132 feet! The Elasmosaurus, 58 feet long, had a snake-like neck 23 feet long, which enabled it to cover a territory 45 feet in height and breadth without moving a foot.

The Dinosaurs were immense land lizards, somewhat resembling the kangaroo. The carnivorous Dinosaurs were a little smaller than those subsisting on vegetable matter, but were possessed of immense strength, which enabled them to make leaps of 70 feet and more. Besides, they were armed with horns and teeth which would have cut through the hide of a rhinoceros as if it had been paper.

At the same time, the waters were lashed by monsters, of which the traditional sea serpent is but a faint image. What dimensions the Mosasaurs had is approximately shown by the fact that, within a cast of one of these creatures, preserved in the British museum, 26 persons have dined very comfortably. Of many of these beasts, remains of which Prof. Cope discovered in the clays of western Kansas, no less than 51 different species had a length of 100 feet and more.

Gigantic birds and lizards with batwings measuring 25 feet from tip to tip, soared through the air in search of prey. The "Mastodon Americanus" exceeded in size the elephant of today as much as an ox does a calf.

By and by, in the course of millions of years, the vast inland seas were filled up, dried up and the monsters here mentioned disappeared.

MARRIAGE SETTLEMENTS.

John C. Calhoun Regarded Them as Unfriendly to the Happiness of the Marriage State.

Just before Calhoun's marriage he had a long talk with the legal counsel of his sweetheart's mother regarding Floride's marriage settlement, and directly thereafter, says George Wolsey Symonds in Ladies' Home Journal, wrote to his prospective mother-in-law on the subject: "From prejudice, or reason, I have always been opposed to marriage settlements. I think experience and reason prove them to be unfriendly to the happiness of the marriage state; and that they tend to produce pecuniary embarrassment. In that state there should be one interest, one happiness and one destiny. That entire confidence, which is reposed by a female in the object of her choice, in placing both her honor and her property in his custody, gives rise to the most sacred and tender regard. A marriage settlement implies a distrust. It is no safety against inevitable accident. It is a guard against the imprudence or misconduct of the husband only. * * * If successful in life there is no benefit in one; if unsuccessful, what more disagreeable than to have property, but not to be able to pay just debts? It would to me be wretched. It would be splendid poverty."

Patience Does the Trick.

When you know you are on the right track, do not let any failures dim your vision or discourage you, for you cannot tell how close you may be to victory. Have patience, and stick, stick, stick, in spite of every hindrance. A Chinese student became so discouraged by repeated failures that he threw his book away in despair. While in this despondent mood he saw a poor woman rubbing an iron rod on a stone to make a needle. Struck by the wonderful patience of the woman, he went back to his studies with new determination and became one of the greatest scholars in China.—O. S. Marden, in Success.

Valuable Old Table Silver.

A complete set of 13 James I. silver spoons belonging to Lord Dormer was sold in London recently for $5,300. Only two other sets are known, one in Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, the other in Goldsmiths' hall in London. An Elizabethan standing salt cellar weighing 20½ ounces was sold for $6,900, nearly $350 an ounce.—Chicago Chronicle.

VALUABLE HISTORIC RELIC.

Washington's Sword to Be Sold by Descendant for the Sake of a Pretty Baby.

Miss Virginia Lewis, who has at last consented to sell the sword of Washington, for which she once refused $50,000, was turned from her desire to keep it by the prattlings of a baby, and that baby is certainly entitled to the money, if blood counts for anything. Mrs. Grace Lee Lewis Mann is the mother of the baby, and the niece of Miss Lewis, who set out for Baltimore a little while ago to sell the sword. Miss Lewis has already negotiated by mail and in person with the Metropolitan museum of New York, but the museum disagrees with her in a matter of $50,000. She wants $100,000 for the heirloom, and its offer has not yet gone above the half of that price, says the Cincinnati Enquirer.

It certainly has accomplished about enough for one sword already. It attended to the settling of some Frenchmen and some Indians in a very neat manner, and later on it showed the British a trick or two. It might have earned a rest by this time, one would think, but no. It is to bring a neat price that Baby Mann may have what her mother calls more "nice things" when she grows up.

The line by which Mrs. Mann traces her connection with George Washington is a long one, full of distinguished people. She is to join the Society of Colonial Dames. A lot of people would give their eyes to be able to squeeze into the Dames by even one ancestor: two makes you a distinguished member. Look at the names on Mrs. Mann's application:

On the paternal side she claims lineal descent from Hon. John Lewis, Hon. Augustine Darner, Col. Lawrence Washington, Col. Augustine Washington, Col. Fielding Lewis. On the maternal side she claims lineal descent from Gov. Samuel Ogle, Gov. Benjamin Tasker, William Bladen, Col. John Tayloe, Hon. Henry Corbin.

Any one of these ancestors would entitle her to become a member of the Colonial Dames. All of them together make her tenfold a member, and that is more than enough for one 17-year-old woman. But she has the further audacity to have George Washington for her great-great-great-granduncle.

This comes through the marriage of Col. Fielding Lewis and Elizabeth Washington, the president's sister.

When Mrs. Mann was baptized the water with which she was sprinkled was contained in Washington's punch bowl. When the baby was baptized a year ago the same punch bowl made the trip from Baltimore to serve as a font for her.

To this same small Betty Washington Mann is to come the heritage of the price of the ancestral sword. It was exhibited at the world's fair, and Miss Lewis was offered $20,000 for it. Later on it went to Tiffany's, and its owner refused a much larger sum for it. She has set her valuation at $100,000 and that price she has determined shall come to California to the little grandniece of the distinguished lineage.

LIKES BUCKWHEAT CAKES.

Emperor William's Chief Cook Taking Lessons in American Culinary Art.

Americans will be glad to learn that a new bond of sympathy has been woven between the German emperor and the people of the great republic. It is announced that the German sovereign has added buckwheat cakes to the royal menu; also codfish cakes, hominy pancakes, oatmeal and Welsh rarebit! By his order the imperial chef took passage on an American liner, and on the voyage was instructed in the preparation of a long list of typically American dishes. The emperor capitulated to buckwheat on the occasion of a recent visit to the new Hamburg-American yacht, the Prinzcessin Victoria Luise. The chef of chefs of the Hamburg-American line is Emil Fahrenheim, of the steamship Deutschland. For the occasion he was transferred to the yacht and for the kaiser's breakfast prepared a typical American menu, which, so the story goes, so pleased the emperor that he invited himself to remain for luncheon and dinner. On his return from the theater at midnight he was regaled with a Welsh rarebit. Then it was that the kaiser capitulated.

"Ach, Gott," he exclaimed fervently, "never have I tasted such delicacies as these buchweizen pfannkuchen and hominy pfannkuchen. They are so light! So tarty! So rich! My cordon bleu shall be instructed in the art of preparing them."

So Herr Voelkers, the koeniglich-kaiserlicher mund koch, sailed with the Deutschland and was put through a course of culinary sprouts, taking voluminous notes, and upon arrival at Cherbourg graduated from the tutelage of Herr Fahrenheim with high honors. Some day he is to make the round trip on th Deutschland and learn further of American cooking. The emperor has but just embarked upon his culinary conquest, and there are still worlds to conquer. The Welsh rarebit will but give him an appetite for the golden buck, the codfish cake, for brown bread and baked beans, the buckwheat cake, for mince pie. And after these there will still remain scrapple and fried mush.

Requires Little Sleep.

The distinction among animals of requiring least sleep belongs to the elephant. In spite of its capacity for hard work the elephant seldom, if ever, sleeps more than four, or occasionally five, hours.—Nature.

"It Seems as Though my Back Would Break."

Is it not true? Women suffer, feel the very life crushed out of them, grow old before their time. Each morning wake up determined to do so much before the day ends, and yet—

Before the morning is very old the dreadful BACKACHE attacks them, the brave spirit sinks back in affright; no matter how hard they struggle, the "clutch" is upon them and they fall upon the couch crying:

"Why should I suffer so? What can I do?"

The answer is ready, your cry has been heard, and a woman is able to restore you to health and happiness.

Backache is only a symptom of more fatal trouble—heed its warning in time.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will stop your torture and restore your courage. Your pains come from unnatural menstruation or some derangement of the womb. Let those who are suffering read Mrs. Morton's letter and be guided by her experience.

AN OPEN LETTER TO WOMEN.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I have been so delighted with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound I thought I would write and thank you. My system was entirely run down. I suffered with terrible backache in the small of my back and could hardly stand upright; was more tired in the morning than on retiring at night. I had no appetite. Since taking your Compound I have gained fifteen pounds, and am gaining every week. My appetite has improved, have no backache, and I look better than I ever looked before.

"I shall recommend it to all my friends, as it certainly is a wonderful medicine."—MRS. E. F. MORTON, 826 York St., Cincinnati, O.

When a medicine has been successful in restoring to health more than a million women, you cannot well say, without trying it, "I do not believe it will help me." If you are ill, don't hesitate to get a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound at once, and write Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., for special advice—it is free.

$5000 REWARD Owing to the fact that some skeptical people have from time to time questioned the genuineness of the testimonial letters we are constantly publishing, we have deposited with the National City Bank, of Lynn, Mass., $5,000, which will be paid to any person who can show that the above testimonial is not genuine, or was published before obtaining the writer's special permission.—LYDIA E. door leads into the pantry, which is 5½x8½ feet. The sink will be of iron lined with white porcelain and will have drip boards at both ends.

All the closets are of a large size. The chamber over the sitting-room has a window leading upon an open balcony. The foundation below ground will be of limestone, rubble work, 16 inches thick. The underpinning will be of brick 12 inches thick, faced with pressed brick. The chimneys showing above the roof will also be of pressed brick. All glass to be American double-thick. All art glass will cost $1.50 per foot. All gutters and downspouts will be of galvanized iron. The shingles shown in gable will be round, butt dimension shingles. The entire building will be sheathed with matched flooring; over this are placed two thicknesses of felt paper, the whole being finished with 4-inch siding. The shingles for roof will be of the Star A Star brand. The roof boards are to be fencing laid 2 inches apart for air space.

The joist for the first and second floors will be 2x10, 16 inches on centers; ceiling joist, 2x6, 16 inches on centers; roof rafters, 2x6, 20 inches on centers, and all studding 2x4, 16 inches on centers. The height of first and second stories will be 9½ feet in the clear, the length of the studding will be 22 feet. The basement contains laundry, furnace room, coal bins and fruit room.

The plastering will be two-coat work. The floors will be double, with felt paper between; the floors in kitchen, bathroom and pantry will be of maple, the reception hall floor and stairway will be of red oak and all other floors will be of pine. The finish throughout will be of pine, painted ivory white. The exterior of the house will have its trimmings painted ivory white, with the body a chocolate color, three-coat work. The veranda and porch floors are to be painted gray, and all sash a dark green. Roof will be stained with yellow ochre. The owner will select and pay for mantel, art glass and shelf hardware.

AN ENGRAVING FREAK.

Entire Alphabet in Old English Lettering Placed on a Pin's Head by a Patient Worker.

There is a man in Philadelphia who wears a commonplace-looking little pin as a watch charm. To the naked eye it is not different from the millions of other pins. Yet its head is a masterpiece of the engraver's art, for on it is engraved the English alphabet in old English lettering, and in the center is cut the year when it was done, "1900."

The naked eye cannot distinguish a scratch on the pin's head, but a powerful magnifying glass, such as is used by a watchmaker, reveals the letters of the alphabet in proper order around the edge of the head, and perfectly formed.

There was on exhibition at the Paris exposition last year a marvel of liliputian work, the writing of the Lord's Prayer on paper one-eighth of an inch square. This was done by Fred Swarts Brink, a penman of Philadelphia. He regarded it as the finest work of the kind ever done, but when he saw the engraving on the pin's head he confessed that he had been outdone. He bought the work of the engraver, August Starcke, for a trifle and recently carried the pin to a jeweler and requested a salesman to have it gold plated and the little ring soldered on the body of the pin, so that he could attach it as a charm to his watch chain.

"Some sentiment connected with the pin, eh?" asked the salesman.

"None at all," replied the customer, "just look at the head through a glass."

The jeweler did so, and then discovered the alphabet. The engraver who did the work spent one year at it, and so tedious was it that he could only work at it a few minutes at a time.—N. Y. Sun.

How Human Skin Is Shed.

Man sheds his skin just as thoroughly as some of the lower orders of creation, but he does it more slowly and imperceptibly. The cells which compose the lower strata of the epidermis are perpetually renewed and push upward, and the outer layer must be constantly removed. This process, which is termed desquamation, is absolute requisite to the health and beauty of the skin. The more rapidly this process is carried on the more clear and transparent becomes the epidermis and the more roseate and velvety the skin tissues which are constantly forming below

USED IN PLACE OF HORSES.

There Have Been Many Queer Animals Employed to Draw Vehicles at Various Times.

The horse and the ox are not the only draft animals man has impressed into his service. When Lord Curzon, the viceroy of India, went to visit one of the native princes recently he was surprised to see in the gorgeous procession which met him two rhinoceroses ridden by postillions. A team almost as strange as that of the Indian nabob is the team of four zebras owned by Walter Rothschild. The banker drives the beasts himself and they never fail to attract attention, says a London exchange.

All visitors to Belgium are familiar with the little carts carrying fruit, milk or vegetables and drawn by one or more powerful-looking dogs. In former days dogs were much more used for draught purposes than they are now. A well-known character who was known as "Old Lal," used to race the coaches on the North road running out of London with a team of dogs. He constructed for himself a sort of buckboard and had harnessed to it four foxhounds, who would cover long distances at a great pace. Later one Dumsdale used to appear on the highways and race the coaches with a small wooden cart. Sometimes the dogs would cover 12 miles an hour, though their natural pace was about seven miles an hour. Dumsdale's favorite trip was from East Grimstead to Brighton and back, a distance of 48 miles. He would make the journey in 24 hours, including stoppages for rest and refreshment.

More than one instance is on record of ostriches being used in place of saddle horses or for drawing light traps.

A wealthy man of Vienna named Doller once built a carriage, on which he attached two bears, while a third was trained to sit beside him on the box seat. With this extraordinary turnout Doller appeared in the streets of the Austrian capital, but complaints were soon made to the police that the bears scared horses and provoked runaways. Doller was forbidden to drive his team in the city. He then started a team of trained wolves, but again the police objected to his displaying his eccentricities in the streets of Vienna and he gave up the attempt to divert the public with strange turnouts.

But the palm of eccentricity in turnouts must be given to an Englishman named Huddy, who, when 97 years old, traveled from Linsmore to Fermoy in an oyster tub set on wheels and drawn by a pig, a badger, two cats and a hedge hog. He wore a high red cap on his head and carried a whip in one hand and a tin horn in the other.

Lemon a Manicure Aid.

"Of all the aids to amateur manicuring," said a woman, "none is more valuable than a bit of lemon. I always keep a morsel on my toilet table and find it indispensable. Unlike any other acid, it bleaches without hurting the skin, as it brings out any native rosiness in the nails without hardening or coarsening them. Scrubbing, and soap and hot water and final polish are all very well; for truly dainty finger tips apply your lemon. I know a number of estimable women who candidly confess that they find it hard to keep their hands clean—particularly in cold weather. Let them try the magic that lies in a bit of lemon and they'll have no further trouble."—Chicago Chronicle.

A Hint to Parents.

Never give up to children if they are in the wrong; do not rob them of a memory that their mother and father were always true to their principles.—Ladies' Home Journal.

GET A MUCH NEEDED LESSON.

Dilatory Women Are Sometimes Cured of Their Failing by Their Masculine Visitors.

If all men would adopt the plan of a certain young man of Baltimore toward his feminine friends there would be less cause for complaint as to the tardiness of the fair sex in keeping their appointments. His rule is never to wait, no matter what the occasion, more than 15 minutes for a young woman. Then, when he calls at a house, he takes out his watch and looks at the time when he enters the drawing-room. He looks at it again and again, and when the quarter of an hour has elapsed, if the young woman upon whom he is calling has not yet made her appearance, he calmly walks out and goes somewhere else, says the Chicago Chronicle.

And this young man's principles on the subject are so well known that he rarely has to study the patterns of the furniture for an interminable time while his hostess assumes her newest frock. He is greeted promptly, but some of his brothers tell pitiful tales of woe on this subject.

One, calling on a feminine friend at seven o'clock the other evening, waited an hour for her appearance. When she finally came in the room she found monsieur deeply interested in a book. He arose then and said: "How-d'ye do" and "Good-by" in a breath.

"You are not going?" asked mademoiselle, aghast.

"Yes, I am," asserted the young man, amiably. "I had an hour that I wished to spend pleasantly, and I have passed it here in your library. Now I must catch a train north."

"Of course, if you will come at unholy hours—" began the woman, but the man had gone.

To be just, the woman of to-day is fairly prompt. She considers it bad form not to be ready to see visitors when they call, but she doesn't consider ten minutes much to take to add some finishing touches to her toilet, and that, it might be whispered, is the reason that one-half of the theater audience comes in when the first act is well under way, that the first numbers of the concert are ruined, the first part of the lecture rendered unintelligible, and that the german commences half an hour later than it should.

When women have an appointment to meet downtown at a certain place each lingers in her own apartments until the hour set for the meeting, so that she won't have to wait an unconscionable time for the other at the rendezvous. Femininity is almost invariably late, even for business engagements, and any excuse it offers, however trivial, it thinks should be accepted as valid.

At catching trains and boats the dilatory sex is, nevertheless, unusually adept. It is said by those who are fond of gathering such statistics that one woman misses a train to about ten men. Madam, however oblivious she may be of time in other matters, if she is going away is sure to be at the station bright and early and with 20 minutes to spare. Whether this proves that the sex is selfish or merely that it is, in the language of the times, "long-headed" is a question for consideration.

MISTAKES THAT PAID WELL.

Errors That Brought Great Profit to the Persons Who Made Them.

Mistakes do not always turn out to work to the detriment of those who make them; sometimes they are golden and put a pretty penny in the pockets of the blunderers. When Orme won the Eclipse stakes at Sandown eight years ago the prince of Wales sent his friend Mr. Courthope to lay a bet on a horse called Orvieto. Mr. Courthope misunderstood the name and placed the prince's money on Orme. When Orme came in a good winner the prince thought, of course, he had lost, instead of which he had won $50,000, says the New York Sun.

A lucky mistake was that which resulted in the opening of the famous Niersfontein gold mine in South Africa and the making of $30,000,000. It was an error that saved a score of people from ruin and made wealthy men of them, for the original intention of 20 poor men who were seeking fortune was to buy a mine called the Rensnek farm. The prospectors who examined this farm found that it gave great promise of a rich mine, and they commisioned an agent to buy it for $6,000. The agent, however, got mixed and made a hopeless blunder through not knowing his district well. He bought another place called Niersfontein for the prospectors, and the money was paid over before the dismayed gold seekers found they were let in for a place they did not want. They refused to accept the deal, but the money had been paid and retraction was impossible. Worst of all, some outside people profited by the error and snapped up the coveted Rensnek.

Before going to law to repudiate the transaction the little company had a look at the despised Niersfontein place, and, on giving a trial to it, they found it worth while to hang on. The other place—the Rensnek—gave out within a fortnight and ruined the company which had bought it, while Niersfontein became a magnificent mine and has yielded over $30,000,000.

Getting Ice Easily.

TAKING IT LITERALLY.

I heard dear Granny say to-day,
What sounded very queer:
"We must not try to put old heads
Upon young shoulders, dear!"

It was to Mother that she spoke
In such a funny way,
And Mother only sighed and smiled,
And bade me run and play!

But when I came to think of it,
I thought how very strange
We children all of us would look
If we could make that change.

Suppose I had dear Granny's head,
Her cap and soft white hair,
Upon my shoulders fixed—my word,
How all the folks would stare!

I almost think 'twould even be
Yet still more queerly mixed,
If Granny had my curly pate
Upon her shoulders fixed!

How funny both of us would look!
We shouldn't like it, though;
And so I'm glad they can't attempt
To make the change, you know!

—Constance M. Lowe, in Cassell's Little Folks.

TREED A MOUNTAIN LION.

Thrilling Adventure of Two Courageous Boys with a Pair of Rifles and a Trusty Dog.

"Two Boys and a Mountain Lion" is the title of an article in a recent St. Nicholas. The author is Williston Hough, and the scene is laid in the Santa Inez mountains.

At this moment the full moonlight fell upon the tree-top and bathed it in a mellow radiance which at once revealed the outline of the panther's powerful form crouching close along the tree-trunk; and even lit up the tawny yellow of his skin. Instantly the great beast showed his dislike of the exposure by creeping farther on among the branches, heralding the move by a half-suppressed angry snarl.

Vernon was glad of the moment's respite in which to think. He argued that the lion would not venture a leap direct to the ground—a straight fall of 20 feet—but would first descend the tree-trunk part way, and then make his spring. He had already taken his stand near the lower end of the slanting tree, and now he saw that the lion would be forced to advance straight toward him, which of course he would do slowly, and thus give him his opportunity.

"If he only waits till the moonlight comes!" thought Vernon, anxiously. For he knew that until the moonlight touched the sights of his rifle there could be no certainty in his aim; and to fire the shotgun at that distance would be hazardous in the extreme, while to advance into the moonlight would be equally so, for he could then be covered at one spring from the panther's hiding-place.

"Only wait, only wait, old fellow!" Vernon repeated to himself, with increasing anxiety, as the critical moment drew nearer.

But the panther was already creeping forward along the tree-trunk. As he emerged from the partial shelter he stopped, stood up his full height, bared his teeth, and snarled a savage snarl of defiance. Vernon hadn't realized before how big and terrible he would look! For a moment he almost wished they were back in the cabin. Morton grasped him by the jacket at the back; and Duke growled a fierce, long, guttural growl, while every bristle along his back stood erect.

SHOT OUT ITS UGLY HEAD.

The panther surveyed the scene with a calmness and deliberation calculated to unnerve any but the steadiest hand. He seemed to be weighing the relative costs of retreating and of advancing. Vernon was suddenly seized by a strong temptation to fire. But he knew that to miss the right spot by so much as an inch might be fatal—he dared not move, and the line of the moonlight on the ground before him was still three feet away! It was a trying moment.

Then the panther began to advance. He crouched and crept slowly forward step by step, snarling and laying back his ears in an ugly manner, while he kept his wicked, gleaming eyes fixed steadily upon the trio.

Vernon felt his flesh begin to creep and his hair to stiffen, and his heart suddenly jumped and began pounding against the wall of his chest. "Fie!" he said to himself, clenching his teeth and fists.

It was over in an instant (Vernon was really a boy of splendid courage,) and his thoughts were again fixed upon the business before him—and none too soon!

The panther had stopped. He crouched lower. The tip of his long tail began to lash from side to side, his head was low and pushed far forward; his thin lips twitched nervously, and his huge claws dug into the bark. Vernon did not need to be told that the lion meant to spring, and that to delay an instant would be fatal. The rifle rose to his shoulder—ah! the moonlight fell full upon the sights. A rising roar was met by a clear, sharp report, which rang back from the cliff and echoed again as a tawny body whirled through the air and fell in a shapeless, quivering mass on the ground below.

"Hurray!" shouted Morton, as the pent-up nervousness escaped in a wild yell of delight.

It was the proudest moment of Vernon's life as he looked down at the great beast's outstretched form.

"The standing up to it was the worst," said Vernon, as he thought of how he had to pull himself together when the panther began to creep toward him along the tree-trunk, uttering that ugly, hissing snarl.

He stooped down and lifted the huge, block-shaped head, and saw that the bullet had passed through the brain and out on the back of the neck. "Must have smashed his neck, too," he said thoughtfully. Then his eyes swept over the handsome length of the skin, and he exclaimed: "By George, but that'll make a trophy! I say, Mort, we'll have it dressed and keep it! Old Mason'll do it for us." And as the idea caught their imaginations, they danced and circled about their prize in the moonlight like young savages, and the walls of the canyon rang again and again with their glee.

SAVED BY A NATIVE.

Dr. Livingstone Attacked by a Lion and Rescued Just in Time by an African Marksman.

Dr. David Livingstone, the great African explorer, had many thrilling experiences during his travels in the unknown wildernesses of the dark continent. What with savage men and ferocious animals his life was in constant danger, but at no time was he nearer death than when he was held under the claws of a huge lion. In 1840 Dr. Livingstone went to South Africa as a missionary and was located in a Bechuana village in the northern part of the present division of Cape Colony. He lived there nine years before he began his expeditions into the unexplored regions farther north.

THE LION GROWLED DEFIANCE.

At one time, while living at this post, the cattle of the village were greatly harassed by lions and at last a concerted effort was made to rid the neighborhood of the animals. Dr. Livingstone and the natives sallied out against the lions and rounded up a number of them. Livingstone singled out a beautiful male lion, took aim and fired. The animal was struck, but received a wound that only served to arouse his anger. Before Livingstone realized what was happening the fierce brute gave a mighty spring and crushed the explorer to the earth. Then he seized Livingstone by the shoulder in his terrible teeth and shook the man as a cat does a mouse. Dr. Livingstone, in telling of the incident afterward, said this shaking caused a numbness to extend over his entire body. He could not move, but he was perfectly conscious and fully realized his danger.

Fortunately some of the natives had seen Dr. Livingstone's peril. As they rushed to his aid the lion placed both forepaws on his victim and growled defiance at the new foe. A well-directed shot from a native's weapon, however, laid him cold in death. Dr. Livingstone's arm had been crushed by the animal's teeth and his body was badly lacerated by the claws, but he recovered. The natives, he said, always seemed to have more respect for him after his narrow escape than they had before.—Chicago Record.

Wanted to Get a Divorce.

Clarence, aged five, had been severely chastised by his parents for disobedience, and the next day, without saying a word to anyone, he called at the office of the family legal adviser, who happened to be a particular friend of the little fellow's. "Well, Clarence," said the man of the law, after shaking hands, "what can I do for you?" "Please, Mr. Brown," replied Clarence, gravely, "I want to get a divorce from our family."

To Soften the Hands.

First wash them in tepid water till every vestige of dirt is removed. Then, before drying, rub well in glycerin and lemon juice mixed in equal proportions. Thoroughly dry with a soft towel, then quickly wash again with cold water and any good soap, keeping them in the water as short a time as possible. Again dry thoroughly and powder with oatmeal.

COLORED SCHOOL.

William Walker, Philip Davis, James Truly.

Trustees are respectfully referred to Chapter 5 of the Public School Laws of Maryland and to Article 3 of the Revised By-Laws of the State Board of Education for the powers vested in and the duties devolving upon them. You are especially requested to look closely to the incidental expenses of your school and see that all charges are fair and reasonable. You will let the contract for furnishing fuel to the lowest responsible bidder, reserving the right to reject any or all bids. You will see that Section 7, Article 5, of the State By-Laws is observed; also the law in regard to substitute teachers. Visit your school as frequently as possible and thereby encourage the teacher in his or her arduous and responsible position, and thus manifest to the children that you are interested in their education or training. By observing the above instructions you will aid the Board very much in advancing the schools of our county.

The Wilkes Stallion

EMPEROR WILKES

TIME, 2.28.

Will stand at the stables of the undersigned in Oakland on the following terms:

$10 to Insure a Mare With Foal.

Money to be paid when mare is known to be with foal. Persons parting with a mare or fails to attend forfeits insurance money. A lien will be retained on the colt until insurance is paid. We will not be responsible for accidents should any occur, but the best of care to prevent such will be exerted.

This horse has a record of 2.34. On a trial he trotted a mile in 2.28. He is a full brother of WILL KERR, 2.07¾, Champion Green Harness Horse of the World, and also of VINETTE, 2.09½.

EMPEROR WILKES is a dark bay stallion, snip on nose, black points, height 15¾ hands. He was bred by Thompson & Bro., Cynthiana, Ky. He comes from the best trotting family of horses in this country and has a bright future. He is the sire of the fastest colts in Garrett county and is without doubt the best bred stallion and the fastest trotting animal in Western Maryland.

House on 5th street, opposite the jail for sale.

A farm one mile from Oakland, containing 187½ acres; about 50 or 60 acres cleared and under cultivation; has been thoroughly limed. Balance of land well timbered. On this farm is one of the best dwelling houses in the county; also stables, wagon sheds, spring house and all necessary outbuildings; water within five feet of kitchen door. This property will be sold cheap.

New house containing eight rooms, cellar, etc., and 26½ acres of ground; barn, stable, and all other outbuildings, adjoining the town of Grantsville, Garrett county. This property is known as the Samuel J. Beachy property, and will be sold cheap.

A farm five miles from Oakland on the Aurora road, containing 200 acres, well watered, fenced, etc.; a good dwelling house, a new barn built last year cost $1,000, and all other necessary outbuildings. This property will be sold on easy terms.

A farm 2½ miles southwest of Oakland, containing ninety acres of ground, well watered and fenced; has been thoroughly limed, and is under a high state of cultivation. First-class dwelling house; new bank barn put up this year; stone spring house and all other necessary outbuildings. One hundred and twenty-five bearing fruit trees of choicest variety. This farm can be bought on easy terms.

A farm five and two-third miles north of Swanton, containing one hundred and ten acres of land, comparatively level, well watered and under fence; eighty acres cleared and under a high state of cultivation; twenty-five acres of good timber; an orchard which never fails to produce fruit, consisting of peaches, pears, plums and apple trees. The buildings on this farm consist of an elegant dwelling house, containing six rooms and a cellar; a bank barn 40x60 feet; a spring house and all necessary outbuildings. This farm can be bought for part cash and balance on time to suit purchaser.

A farm known as the "Swauger Mill Property," containing eighty-six acres of land, partly cleared and balance in hemlock timber. The buildings consist of a dwelling house, small storehouse, a water-power grist mill, stable and all other necessary outbuildings. Besides being well watered by a stream running from one end of the place to the other it has on it a lake, covering about seven acres, which has been stocked with 40,000 brook and rain bow trout. This property can be bought at a low figure, part cash and balance on time, to suit purchaser, at five per cent. interest.

I have also houses to rent and sell in the town of Oakland.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 25. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JUNE 13, 1901. NUMBER 14.

NO THIRD TERM.

President McKinley Makes a Statement to That Effect.

WASHINGTON, June 11.—The following personal statement by the President was given out at the White House at noon today:

"I regret that the suggestion of a third term has been made, and I doubt whether I am called upon to give it notice, but there are questions of gavest importance before the administration, and the country's just consideration should not be prejudiced by even a suspicion of my accepting a third term.

"In view of the suggestion of it, I will say now once and for all, that I not only am not nor will be a candidate for a third term, but would not accept the nomination for it if tendered me.

"My only ambition is to serve through my second term to the acceptance of my countrymen, whose generous confidence I so deeply appreciate. Then with them will I do my duty in the ranks of private citizenship.

"WILLIAM MCKINLEY."

The statement was the subject of last night's cabinet session and caused quite a sensation in political circles.

The cabinet approved the action and sentiment of the President.

A Good Cough Medicine.

It speaks well for Chamberlain's Cough Remedy when druggists use it in their own families in preference to any other. "I have sold Chamberlain's Cough Remedy for the past five years with complete satisfaction to myself and customers," says Druggist J. Goldsmith, Van Etten, N. Y. "I have always used it in my own family both for ordinary coughs and colds and for the cough following la grippe, and find it very efficacious." For sale by all dealers.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. James Green, auditor's office West Va. C. & P. R. R., Elkins, West Ga., came home Saturday to visit his parents at Brantsburg, and of course while here called on his very best girl.

Mr. E. Kemp spent Sunday with relatives in Frostburg.

Mr. Haynes moved to Keyser on Tuesday, where he is working on the preparatory building of the West Virginia University.

Mr. G. C. Pattison returned home on Tuesday from a trip to the eastern cities, in which Buffalo was taken in.

We are informed that there will be several ice cream parlors in town during the summer. The Mite Society of the M. E. church expect to establish one as soon as a suitable location can be secured.

Politics in this locality seem to be playing a game something like "hot butter beans"—the nearer we get to the time of holding the primaries the more the merits of the several candidates are discussed and hotter the discussion becomes.

Ravenscroft and George have been about the only candidates we have heard mentioned to any great extent until in the last few days Col. Sturgiss, the popular Oakland druggist, has received the warmest commendation from all quarters and if the good things spoken in favor are indicitive strength, he is a sure winner under the circumstances, so far as this district is concerned.

Both Ravenscroft and George are under fire. Both have their friends, both their enemies, but the general opinion, so far as we can catch it as it goes flooding by, is that neither of them has any kick coming and that the Republicans certainly have been good to them. Some claim that the former is the owner of valuable property, an officer in a trust company, interested in gold diggings and various other investments.

George gets a similar raking, although he is not quite so well fixed financially as his rival, yet he is regarded as being well paid for the services rendered his party in the way of positions that have at all times been highly remunerative and honorable. Reasoning this way it seems natural to look for a third party as a solution of the problem and as Col. Sturgiss is eminently capable in every respect, a strong party man and worker, well known all over the county, the conclusion would be he is just the man for the place.

Unnecessary Loss of Time.

Mr. W. S. Whedon, Cashier of the First National Bank of Winterset, Iowa, in a recent letter gives some experience with a carpenter in his employ, that will be of value to other mechanics. He says: "I had a carpenter working for me who was obliged to stop work for several days on account of diarrhoea. I mentioned to him that I had been similarly troubled and that Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy had cured me. He bought a bottle of it from the druggist here and informed me that one dose cured him, and he is again at his work." For sale by all dealers.

CORKSCREW PHILOSOPHY.

Love is a delusion and marriage its conclusion.

The busy man needs no companion. Idleness is always wearisome.

What is well done betters what is yet to do. Make stepping stones of your work.

Everything comes to him who waits—is an old saying, but keep working while you are waiting.

Shake hands with all religions, but don't lose your head while you are getting acquainted.

Religion is a life work—belief is a question of the day, and faith is crystalized belief.

Lies are tools used in cutting the teeth of the innocent. A good liar is sometimes a blessing in disguise.

If you must lie, at least tell honest lies—a dishonest truth is blacker than the blackest lie.

Women are the soul of logic—there is nothing more conclusive than a woman's "I told you so." Plato could not upset it.

GRANTSVILLE.

My recent visit to Oakland was greatly enjoyed, saddened only by the absence of many old friends who have passed the "great divide" and are now enjoying their reward. The genial face and kindly greetings of those old associates always made a visit to our county seat a great pleasure. Yet our cordial reception by all your good people left nothing in the way of hospitality to be desired.

Great improvements have been made in and around your beautiful and thriving city, among the most notable being your well-built roads. The condition of our county roads in other sections of the county is deplorable. Some action should be taken to make a better road between Grantsville and Oakland or a gradual estrangement of these sections will follow. Few from this end of the county of the county care to travel these roads in their present condition. Our efficient and energetic commissioners are doing much to improve them, but much remains to be done. It is to be hoped the parties building a railroad through the Casselman valley will at least repair damages done.

The contemplated call for the Republican primaries during the present month is causing considerable comment.

Garrett county requires legislation and will demand the repeal of some unwise laws. We have abundant material to select from and it is to be hoped a strong and influential delegation will be sent to Annapolis to represent the banner county.

The Casselman valley will name her man in due time. With such material as Ralph Engle, Ross Compton, C. J. Otto and Phineas Boucher to select from old No. 3 will be heard again in the halls of legislation.

OCCASIONAL.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The past week was a busy one at the Park. The new arrivals were very many. All the hotel people are on the ground. Some of the hotels and a number of boarding houses have guests.

The weather permitting the first service for the season will be held in the tabernacle. It is an inviting place. The work of the whitewashers is a credit to the workmen The seats have been placed, and the building is ready for service. The honor of preching the first sermon will be enjoyed by the genial U. B. pastor of the Loch Lynn, Rev. C. Fisher. A good sermon may be expected.

The Maxwell house is nearing completion. It will be one of the best houses in the county when turned over to the owner by the contractors.

About two-thirds of the cottages are occupied. There are only half a dozen cottages yet for rent. The demand for eight room cottages cannot be met. This speaks well for the Park.

Mr. Chas. Tower and wife were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Carr Friday night.

Our old friend T. J. Peddicord was a visitor at this place last Thursday.

Rumor has it that Dr. McComas will take charge of the drug store. We hope it is true. The Doctor has always gave good service.

The farmers are beginning to bring in their produce and find ready sale for it at good prices.

C. S. May, at Swanton, will buy all wool this year for cash. See him before you sell. 4t

ACCIDENT.

Senator Ravenscroft drove up to Oakland Sunday afternoon, returning Tuesday evening.

Dentist Greene and wife, of Washington, D. C., are located at Hotel Englehart.

Mr. Daniel Hinebaugh, of the metropolis, spent Sunday with his sister, Mrs. Aaron Boyer. He returned to Oakland Monday morning, accompanied by Walter Sanner.

Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Buechly, of Jenner, Pa., are visiting relatives and friends in and about town.

Mrs. Penn W. Whetsell and children are visiting Mrs. W.'s parents, Mr. and Mrs. Aaron Boyer.

Mr. and Mrs. William Speicher, accompanied by Mrs. Harvey Speicher and children, drove down to Meyersdale last Friday, returning Monday.

Jas. H. Atkinson, of Frostburg, has relieved J. S. Meyers of the duties of storekeeper and gauger at the Miller distillery.

Dr. W. Ravenscroft is treating the Bellevue to a fresh coat of paint. Recently he put a cement floor in the cellar. The repairing already done at the premises has greatly improved the appearance of the property.

Merchant Gnagey has gone to the Pittsburg markets on business.

We notice through the columns of THE REPUBLICAN that a change has been ordered on the mail route between this place and Oakland, to go into effect July 1, 1901. This has caused much dissatisfaction and a great uproar among the people of this section of the county. They are bitterly opposed to the change as it will greatly delay the dispatching of and receiving mails at this office as well as intermediate points along the route. Mails coming to Oakland by train for points on the route will be delayed from 12 to 24 hours. While anyone desiring to transact business with the banks cannot get a reply under three days. Money being sent to the bank for deposit would not reach the office in Oakland until after banking hours, and hence remain in the office until the following day. In this manner it would be in danger, especially in the case of postoffie robbery as has already been in a previous plight in Oakland. And in like manner if any one desiring money sent from the bank the banker would be obliged to take the money to the office the day before sending it, where under the present arrangements a letter can be sent to Oakland and a reply received the same day.

It is an outrage to meddle politics in with the carrying of the mails and thereby depriving the citizens of their postal facilities. The people will not stand such fiendish work and will fight it to a finish. We are surprised at the editors of our several county papers that they do not offer a protest against this absurd imposition upon the public, which will delay the delivery of their papers, as well as receiving matter for publication, eighteen hours or more.

Mail routes are not established for the adaptability of the contractors, but for the convenience of the public. The party interposing in this matter, who is seeking political honors from the hands of the Republicans, will be kindly remembered on election day next fall should he be so successful as to get the nomination.

We predict, however, the downfall which is justly due him, and while he has gained a friend or two in Oakland, he has lost the support of a great number of the stauncest Republicans in this section of the county.

We are strong advocates of the old saying: "Let good enough alone," when considered so by the people who are greatly interested and receive much service therefrom.

DAWN AT LAST.

Wandering far from Thee in darkness,
Sore oppress'd, hope almost o'er,
In Satan's chains a fetter'd captive,
Out on Sin's bleak dismal shore;
Crush'd to earth, with strength fast failing,
Thro' weight of woes that held us fast,
When at last, Thou Blessed Saviour,
From Calvary's Cross came dawn at last.

CHORUS.

Dawn at last, thou Son of David,
Dawn at last, thro' Grace Divine;
May we ever show contrition,
Sin no more, be ever Thine.

Toiled we long in Satan's service,
Thy commands have set at naught,
Anxious fears and ceaseless sorrows,
Deep despair and vileness wrought;
When in anguish'd tones we sought Thee,
Bless'd Jesus, Thou did'st hear,
And Thy soothing answer to us,
Cast from us all doubt and fear.

Now we feel a newness in us,
Which Thy Grace alone doth give;
May Thou ever be our Shepherd,
We within Thy fold to live.
Oh! thou erring hapless sinner,
Come and quench thy raging thirst,
And beside the flowing fountain
Rest in peace on Jesus' breast.

Communicated.

To the Citizens and Voters of Garrett County:

We are about to enter upon another campaign which, local in its general character, will carry with it a specific and wider influence which if not carefully guarded in the onset may be detrimental not alone to the interests of our county and State but to the Nation. I speak of the election of a United States Senator, which will take place at our next State Assembly in 1902. And the selection of our State Delegates and Senators, whose first duties are obligatory to their own people and county next to the general interest and welfare of the State, and while we entertain no doubt of their loyalty in every duty devolving upon them, we should have some assurance from the candidates for the nomination for Senate and House of Delegates as to who amongst the several aspirants to the high office of United States Senator will be their choice, for there are some even in the Republican ranks whom we prefer to others. But the duty of repealing and correcting malformed laws and formulating and reenacting better ones should engage their most serious attention and time when on duty, and we the voters should demand of them some pledge in regard to special legislation for Garrett county that the will of the people may no longer be ignored. We have men in Garrett county qualified for those onerous duties and their nomination should engage our first attention, and while we have quite a number whose education and knowledge of the needs of our county are adequate, we have but few whose parlimentary education and tact are equal to the emergencies in the cases. Hence I believe it is our duty to favor the nomination of those who have had such experience and training. We have Hons. R. A. Ravenscroft and A. F. George, either of whom I believe well qualified.

As to the choice of legislators let us also bear in mind that the same degree of parlimentary knowledge, tact, force and decision of character are peremtory necessities in them also, of whom, as in the other case, we have but few.

As to the local offices to be filled we have abundant good and deserving material to choose from, and I have no doubt that the choice for each will be wisely made.

Bur let us lay aside our prejudices in the other case now and when a change for new senatorial and legislative material is to be made let it be at a time less momentous in our county and State affairs.

Asking your wise consideration of my suggestions and promising more anon, I am Yours truly,

S. E. FLOWERS, SR.

HOYES.

Mr. J. Arthur DeWitt, is i nproving his property with a new wire fence.

Mrs. Abel Dewitt of near Deer Park, was visiting relatives at Selbysport, and Hoyes, several days last week.

Mr. Joe Keller purchased a fine driving horse of Willie Mattingly on Monday of this week.

Mr. Bert Cuppett accompanied by Miss Crane, of Loch Lynn, was calling on Mr. Cuppett's parents Saturday and Sunday.

Mr. Geo. E. Bishoff gave a turkey dinner to some of his near relatives on Sunday last. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Henry Miller and little son of Mt. Savage

A number of our singers attended singing school at Flatwoods Sunday last.

Last Sunday was church day at the Catholic church and it was well attended.

Col. DeWitt, our buggy agent is doing quite a good business.

Mr. Arthur DeWitt and Percy Lowdermilk attended quarterly meeting at Selbysport Sunday. We are not sure that quarterly meeting was the only attraction as Selbysport can boast of some very fine looking young ladies.

Mr. Adolph Enlow is erecting a large new barn on his farm and Mr. Charles DeWitt also is preparing to build an addition to his house.

W. A. Smith attended the K. of P. lodge at Friendsville last Friday evening.

Miss Ora Hoye, of Sang Run was the guest of Miss Allie Custer last Sunday.

After July 1st our mail route from Accident to Oakland will change carriers and we noticed in last week's paper that the mail was to start from Oakland instead of Accident, over which our people are very indignant as it is quite an inconvenience in many ways. We receive our mail one day later in the week and mail that we should receive on Saturday we will not get until Monday. It also breaks connection with branch routes from Hoyes to Sang Run and Elder. Petitions are in circulation to the department requesting that the route be left as it is and we hope they will be recognized by the department.

JUSTICE.

You may as well expect to run a steam engine without water as to find an active, energetic man with a torpid liver and you may know that his liver is torpid when he don't relish his food or feels dull and languid after eating, often has headache and sometimes dizziness. A few doses of Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets will restore his liver to its normal functions, renew his vitality, improve his digestion and make him feel like a new man. Price, 25 cents. Samples free at all drug stores.

SHORT RUN.

This has been a very wet and cold spring, but it has been warmer with more sunshine for the last few days.

The crops are looking good excepting corn. There is a good prospect for all kinds of fruit. It has been unfavorable for spraying.

James H. Wilson has set out an orchard of 100 apple trees and 200 peach trees. They are all growing. He noticed a new enemy on his young trees. It is a large bug that feeds on the buds. Can anyone tell us what they are and how to get rid of of them?

Bert Harvey, the Elk Garden butcher, was here yesterday buying cattle.

A. E. Harvey is still blacksmithing for the Blaine Coal Co.

There are three coal mines operating near Blaine. Blaine is building fast and will be a good market for farm produce.

Bert Wilson, who is going to St. John's College, will be at home before long. We are sure he is making good use of his free scholarship from Garrett county.

The illiterates in Election District No. 13 are few, only about six or seven. The Republicans are organizing and are going to show their stripes. Three cheers for No. 13, for she is solid.

Lee Uphold was a welcome visitor at D. R. Harvey's this week.

D. R. Harvey, has bought a lot of of timber. He will cut and log it this summer.

The young folks of this place, Ryan's Glade and Elk Garden are going to the Pinnach, one of the finest views near here. It is about six miles east of Elk Garden and the point of the Alleghany mountains. They are anticipating a good time.

M. H. Nelder is all smiles; it is a girl.

The best of all our Sunday school and church are in a prosperous condition still there is room for improvement.

I will leave the rest of the news for the bee bird. Come again.

HOW LAW AFFECTS THE DEMOCRATS.

Will Lose Votes in Many Counties—Senator McComas Surprised at Republican Confidence.

While the Democrats are squabbling the Republicans are getting together.

Not in the history of the party have the conditions been so favorable as at present. In city and in counties there is the same confidence, the disfranchisement law to the contrary notwithstanding. As a matter of fact this act is no longer regarded an obstacle. It has had an effect not anticipated by the Democratic party managers, who pushed it through the Legislature. Schools have sprung up like mushrooms. In every hamlet the instructors are at work teaching the illiterate how to mark their ballots, while the Democrats do not appear at all concerned about those of their party whom they have disfranchised.

A covert threat was made recently by a Somerset county politician, who, when informed of the work being done by the Republicans, said their labors would count for naught, as the Democrats intended to use German script, which they would be unable to decipher. When former Senator Dryden, the county leader, was told of this, he replied that if permissible they might use Greek or Hebrew letters, when only a chosen few could vote. At any rate, if letters were used which would practically debar one half the voters, the court would be asked to issue a mandamus, and if this was refused the responsibility could be placed where it belonged.

It is hardly probable, however, that such revolutionary methods will be employed. Many a Democrat would be deprived of the right of franchise if unreadable tickets were printed.

In Queen Anne the Democrats are already kicking because of the many votes lost to them. The leaders who attended the State committee meeting were not at all sanguine over the outcome in this Democratic stronghold. Mr. John Wilson, the Republican leader, thinks they will use some device to enable their illiterates to vote. Unless they do their usual majority will be materially reduced, if not quite wiped out.

Indeed, just now the Democrats are more worked up over the result of their handiwork than the Republicans, who, as above stated, are rapidly getting their people in shape and are no longer concerned about the law.

At the meeting of the State Central Committee last week Senator McComas asked every county representative as to the political conditions in his district, and without exception every one declared the outlook never was brighter. "I was really amazed," said he, subsequently, "at the confidence of these men. Even those counties which the Democrats should win easily they claim to be able to carry. This feeling means much to our party. Half the battle is already won when victory is scented from afar. But it will not do to take anything for granted. We must continue to work and never let up until the polls close."

Chairman Goldsborough was also agreeably surprised when the reports came in. He knew of the conditions in his and adjoining counties, but attributed these to local troubles which operated against these Democrats. He had no idea that Democratic disaffection was so widespread. An exuberant Republican representative offered to bet the Democrats would not carry more than two counties in the First district.

Ex-Congressman Barber, who will probably be the candidate for Senator from Talbot, entertains not the slightest doubt of Republican success in his county. He will manage the fight in person, and, as the party differences have been minimized, a practically solid vote will be cast. Talbot has always been the stronghold of the silverites, and these are bitterly opposed to Mr. Gorman's candidacy. Editor Lightbourne of the Peninsular Democrat is pouring hot shot into the anti-Bryanites and making war on their leader. Add to his opposition that of the Independents who followed General Hardcastle when he antagonized the machine and it is plain that the regulars are fighting against odds.

For Rent or Sale.

"PALS."

By C. E. Weigall.

"BY THEIR fruits shall ye know them.

"Still to ourselves in every place consigned,
Our own felicity we make or find."

He lay on his bed-cot and looked at the stars through a chink in the roof between window and canvas.

It was a very hot night, of that breathless, lurid deadness that makes a Malta summer a weariness of the flesh. Inside his tent 13 sturdy souls were snoring, under their brown blankets, the sleep of the just; but the fourteenth, Gunner Amherst, had been awake since "Lights out," and sleep would probably not visit his eyes at all until the little bugler sounded reveille from the guard-room steps at Tigne fort.

He was thinking, and perhaps there was some excuse for the deep concentration necessary for such a purpose, for Amherst did not often indulge in an art so purely imaginative.

The tramp of the sentry up and down across the square on his eternal round, the sob of the tide under the sheer cliff, the call of a distant siren from a ship in the grand harbor, were the only sounds that broke the stillness of the night.

In the daytime Gunner Amherst had no time for thought. Drills and fatigues, drinks in the canteen, cricket or football, as the season might allow; bathing, a further pint in the canteen with a chum, and then "Last Post," did not leave much time in which a man might develop original traits or even a habit of thought, for in his set the reading-room was not the fashion.

His face was puckered into a frown that marred the usual good temper of its dare-devil expression. He had something on his mind, and that something led him at last to rise from his bed-cot, and don the few clothes necessary to decency, quietly tiptoeing at last out of the tent.

Keeping in the shadow of the buildings, away from earshot of the sentry, he skirted the camp till he came out beyond the gray walls of the fort above the sea. There he sat him down among the short, sunburnt stubble and sand, and bared his great chest to the cool night wind of heaven that blew from the dread Sirocco quarter.

"My!" he said, "I'm battlin' it out, but I don't come anigh the end of it. If Jem takes the stripe, it's splits between him and me; there's too many 'alf quarterns—or the end on 'em—down agen me, to see me a bloomin' Bombardier. Now, Jem'll go mashin' about with N. C. O.'s, and mayn't look at an old pal, and as to speaking to me friendly like, why, it's all down in the regulations as there's a great gulf between them and the likes of us, me in particular, as one as 'as a many things down on my defaulter's sheet as shouldn't be there. We've been friends since the first day 'e joined—'im 'an me together—rookies as didn't know a gun from a pea-stick. It was always the same afore we joined, at 'ome in the old place. If there was a furrow to be plowed, Jem always took first prize, though I might run the show pretty nigh; or a piece to be sung at the harvest-home, or a holiday-making, when there was a choice of anyone to go, Jem was always chosen. But I was never one to feel jealous like. Same as when 'e went off with my gal, Molly Maloney—'oo could feel jealous of Jem?"

Amherst paused a moment and gazed at the sky, crisped into points of yellow stars. The wash of the sea had made him melancholy, perhaps, as he was out of sorts. That one last glass of beer the night before in the canteen had been too much for "Old Devil-may-care," as his companions called him. He leaned up against a grey rock bowlder, and tore up a tussock of grass.

"A. N. C. O. mayn't speak to a ordinary gunner when 'e pals with the other lot o' sarjints and their belongings. Don't know as I pants to do that though! If it was me, I don't think as 'ow I'd ever chuck a pal—and yet there's a deal o' pleasure in bein' looked up to! Not as anyone'll ever look up to me—I'm a bit of a waster."

There was a suspicious moisture in the eyes of this "bit of a waster." He was not in the least a romantic figure. His good-looking face had not the alert expression of influencing power that belongs to the born non-commissioned officer of the British army. His clothing, too, was unromantic, consisting of a pair of khaki trousers and a patched vest hung on anyhow, his feet thrust into broken canvas bathing shoes.

He was roused by a quick step on the grass behind him, and started at once into defiant life again. Tears would be a lasting disgrace if discovered, and he became merely a motionless gunner, looking out with stiff intentness at the far faint line of the Sicilian coast.

"Davy! Whatever are you doing here?"

It was the old name, familiarly spoken. No one ever called him Davy now. To his superiors he was simply a bad lot, though a good all-round athlete; and to his companions, a fellow who could crack a good tale, and put away more beer than any other—a fellow, too, whose one stupendous folly was being too chummy with a man who was on the roll for promotion, a man who loved the reading-room, and who was in the choir at the little Garrison Chapel, and in high favor with the powers that be.

"Yes, Jem," he said, glibly, "I was just 'avin a bit of a toddle—the tent seemed chokey like. I should think as the thermometer must be about a 'undred in there."

"Aye," said Jem, laconically, "I seed you pass. I was standing at the door of No. 15 hut, and I thought as 'ow I'd come and see what you was up to."

"You might get into a row," returned Amherst, "and that 'ud be bad for you just now."

"No worse for me than you."

Jem set himself squarely down on a bowlder at his companion's side, and settled his chin upon his folded brown fists.

"Davy," he said, "do you remember Molly Maloney?"

Amherst's face quivered; but he said, sturdily: "Aye, we'll not talk of 'er just now, Jem."

Jem's face was determined; his mouth set in a hard line, that spoiled his good looks, giving to his face an expression of obstinate firmness that gave one a fresh insight into his character.

"Do you mind her yellow hair, like the buttercups in Mile End Close farm, and her eyes blue and big, like the forget-me-nots by the mill-pond, where the rushes was so fine and large? She was a neat dresser, and had a pretty foot, too."

"Aye," said Davy.

"And the Sunday evenin' when we three walked back from church, and the sky was like the inside of a pink shell, with streaks like a violet here and there? And she says to me, what a pretty voice I had in the tenor parts, and never said a word to you, though you and she was courtin'."

Amherst made a motion with his head, for his lips were dry and speechless.

"And maybe you were wondering why we weren't married, and why I never said a word about it to you, after she give you the chuck, and she and me went walkin' together."

"Maybe you was delicate about it, and didn't like to 'urt my feelin's."

Davy's voice was hoarse; he was so eager to find an excuse for the man to whom he had been doggedly faithful for these many years through thick and thin.

"'Twas only natural as she should prefer you. I'm a poor one at expressin' my feelin's, and a poor sort of chap and all. While as for you—"

"While, as for me," said Jem, calmly, "you thought as 'ow I was a nasty, sneakin' chap, and had took Molly away from you, temptin' her like; while the real truth is, Davy, though I never told you before, that she wasn't worth a snap of your fingers or of mine, for I knew she was flirtin' with that red-headed chap at the blacksmith's all the time you was a courtin' of 'er; and if a girl could go on with one chap when she had promised to marry another, it seemed to me as she was not good enough to be a pal's wife. She walked with me a bit, and then—why, I told 'er as I meant nothin', seein' she was on with two or three other chaps, and you was too blind to see it. I only done it to show you what she was and to stop you from throwin' your stupid old self away upon a good-for-nought."

"You did it for that?" Davy's voice was tremulous in its intensity of earnestness. "Why, I thought as 'ow you loved 'er, and was goin' to get the stripe so as you could get married to 'er."

"I'm not a-going to take no stripe," said Jem, steadily. "You're out there, Davy."

"Why, the colonel spoke to you this mornin', I know 'e did, for Stubbs told me."

"Aye, Davy, did you never think that you and me would be separated as far as the sea is from yon mountain? You've been a bit unfortunate in the drinkin' line, and that's agen you for promotion, but if you was thinkin' that I was a goin' to be set over your head, you was wrong, Davy Amherst. Pals we was in the old days, and pals we'll be till we snuffs out, and that's enough for me, if it is for you."

Amherst's hand stole a little nearer to the clenched fist on the stubble. "God's truth?" he said.

"God's truth," said Jem.

The vow was taken as solemnly as though some pledge of vast importance was being registered.

"Jem, it was 'urtin' me cruel, that thought of you and me never speakin'," said Davy, at last, sheepishly. "If you like, I'll keep a bit straighter. At least, I'll try to keep that way on."

Amherst was nothing if not honest, and Jem admired him for it.

"It'll be no use, Davy. I know you of old," he answered, hopefully. "The very smell of a beer-jug 'll draw you a mile, but I'll take the will for the deed, old chap."

When two furtive, lightly-garbed figures stole back to their respective beds, the sky was shivering towards the dawn. As Amherst crept into his bed, the next man to him moved, and muttered in his sleep. "We beseech Thee to hear us, Good Lord." He was the second tenor in the choir, and had been practicing some new music the day before at the squeaking harmonium.

"Amen," said Davy, fervently, as he drew the blanket over his head.

At the same moment the bugle rang out "Reveille," clear as a bell—resonant as the last trump—each note rising and falling on the still air. It was echoed from cliff to cliff, from fort to barracks, till the whole island rang with the news that another day was born.

And the gunners of Tigne woke to reluctant life, and grumbled themselves into uniform and pipe-clayed helmets once again. But there was gladness in two rough, honest hearts, for a shadow had rolled away with the purple line of night-cloud into the sea. —Black and White.

Of honest, open heart,
Of bright inquiring mind.

The mother's wealth of love
She lavished on her boy;
To whom she fondly clung,
Her only earthly joy.

Without his father's hand,
Its guidance and restraint,
Sad change in time she saw,
And heard her son's complaint,

That home was not as bright
As scenes upon the street,
Where folly's songs were sung,
Hard by the scorner's seat.

Corrupt companionship,
With evil leaven fraught,
In body, spirit, soul,
Its subtle poison wrought.

The voice within at first
Condemns the lighter drinks;
Yet reason as he may,
He through indulgence sinks.

The mother patient bore
The folly of her child;
Her heart, its agony,
Suppressed to accents mild.

She summoned all the strength
Of self-denying love,

That home, with added charms,
Its sacred worth might prove.

But Satan, subtle fiend,
By sin's delusion charmed,
His victim blindly led,
His captive's fear disarmed.

Until debased, he trod
Of hell the very brink!
And in his ravings cursed
And fought the demon Drink!

The mother's tortured heart
In agony now broke;
And to his double crime
The son, in horror woke.

But mercy spread her wings
And brooded o'er the loss;
And now, redeemed, he clings
A contrite to the Cross.

The mother's tears and prayers,
Preserved a pledge on high,
Now fall in dews of grace
From out the answering sky.

A NATIONAL EVIL.

An Iniquity That Could Be Put Away If All Its Enemies Were United.

Drunkenness is the greatest evil of this nation, and it takes no logical process to prove that a drunken nation cannot long be a free nation. Drunkenness is not subsiding, certainly it is not at a standstill, but it is on an onward march, and it is a double quick. There is more rum swallowed in this country, and of a worse kind, than was ever swallowed since the first distillery began its work of death. Where there was one drunken home there are ten drunken homes. Where there was one drunkard's grave there are 20 drunkards' graves.

If we could gather all the armies of the dead drunkards, and have them come to resurrection, and then add to that host all the armies of living drunkards, five and ten abreast, and then if we could have you mount a horse and ride along that line for review, you would ride that horse until he dropped from exhaustion, and you would mount another horse and ride until he fell from exhaustion, and you would take another and another, and you would ride along hour after hour, and day after day. Great hosts, in regiments, in brigades. Great armies of them. And then if you had voice enough stentorian to make them all hear, and you could give the command: "Forward, march!" their first tramp would make the earth tremble. Whichever way you look in the community to-day, the evil is increasing.

Sermons setting forth the perils that threaten the destruction of our American institutions would be very poorly planned sermons if they did not speak of drunkenness. Is it a state evil, or is it a national evil? Does it belong to the north, or does it belong to the south? Does it belong to the east, or does it belong to the west? Ah! there is not an American river into which its tears have not fallen and into which its suicides have not plunged. What ruined that southern plantation? Every field a fortune the proprietor and his family once the most affluent supporters of summer watering-places. What threw that New England farm into decay and turned the roseate cheeks that bloomed at the foot of the Green mountains into the pallor of despair? What has smitten every street of every village, town and city of this continent with a moral pestilence? Strong drink. O how many are waiting to see if something cannot be done! Thousands of drunkards waiting who cannot go ten minutes in any direction without having the temptation glaring before their eyes or appealing to their nostrils, they fighting against it with enfeebled will and diseased appetite, conquering, then surrendering, conquering again and surrendering again, and crying: "How long, O Lord, how long before these infamous solicitations shall be gone?" And how many mothers there are waiting to see if this national curse cannot lift!

To-day the church holds the balance of power in America; and if Christian people—the men and the women who profess to love the Lord Jesus Christ and to love purity and to be the sworn enemies of all uncleanness and debauchery and sin—in all such would unite, this evil would soon be overthrown. Think of all the churches and Sunday schools in Christendom shoulder to shoulder! How very short a time it would take them to put down this evil, if all the churches of God—trans-Atlantic and cis-Atlantic—were united on this subject! "Venom of the worm that never dies."

Whether you live in Brooklyn or New York, or Chicago or Cincinnati, or Savannah or Boston, or Topeka, or in any of the cities of this land, count up the saloons on your own street, and see they are far out of proportion to the increase of the population. You people who are so precise and particular lest there should be some imprudence or rashness in attacking the rum traffic, will have your son some night pitched into your front door dead drunk, or your daughter will come home with her children because her husband has, by strong drink, been turned into a demoniac. The rum fiend has despoiled whole streets of good homes in all our cities. Fathers, brothers, sons on the funeral pyre of strong drink!

The dram-shop is a great caldron of inquity in our time. Anarcharsis said that the vine bore three grapes; the first was pleasure, the next was drunkenness, and the next misery. Every saloon above ground or under ground is a fountain of iniquity. It may have a license and it may go along quite respectably for awhile, but after awhile the cover will fall off and the color of the iniquity will be displayed.

We might in this country — this traffic perished—have less revenue, but we would have more happy homes, and we would have more peace, and we would have fewer people in the penitentiary, and there would be tens of thousands of men who are now on the road to hell who would start on the road for Heaven.

"Thou shalt speak my words unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear."—Ezekiel 2:7."

SPIRITUAL SIGHT.

Only an Artist Sees the Sunset Tints and Only the Pure in Heart See God.

One may easily carry 100 pounds if the burden rests on his back, yet a grain of sand in his eye will rob him of sight. When the Master said that the pure in heart see God, He did not mean a time in the future; He meant vision, now. How slight a thing dims that vision! The reason we do not see better is because we do not live purer. Having eyes, we do not see; something has blunted our eyesight. When the old priest went into the temple he saw the Holy Child; he saw what others did not see—for his heart was pure. There were many blind eyes in the temple that day; and the grief of it is they did not know they were blind. You do well to give some attention to spiritual sight. You cannot expect to see God through the opaque lenses of worldliness; it takes rare vision to see Him.

"I never saw such tints in a sunset," said a shallow critic to an artist as they stood before the canvas. "Don't you wish you did?" was the searching reply of the artist. No, that man never saw such tints in a sunset; he was blind, and did not know it. It takes rare sight to see the changing hues of a summer sunset. Only the lenses of a pure heart ever bring the glory of God into focus. "Blessed are your eyes, for they see." Do they?—Baptist Union.

Permanent.

So few articles in daily use are made well enough to give satisfaction that it is a pleasure to read a letter like that written by Mr. T. B. Cutler, of Cincinnati, Ohio, as follows: "Palmer's Lotion" has cured me of tetter with which I had been afflicted for over twelve years, from which I could find no permanent relief until I used this wonderful preparation." Mr. Cutler was right; the effects of Palmer's Lotion are permanent, and it is a wonderful preparation that should be kept in every home. Water in the Philippines.

In asking the natives for water in the Philippines our soldiers learned that in one province the word was "aqua," in another "tubig," and in a third "denum." So "wate" or "watty" has been implanted in the Filipino dialects. Another American introduction is "chow chow," meaning food. The natives also have invented a word from looking on at games of chuck-a-luck. They think "upshecomes" is an English name for all kinds of gambling.

WHY MRS. PINKHAM

Is Able to Help Sick Women When Doctors Fail.

How gladly would men fly to woman's aid did they but understand a woman's feelings, trials, sensibilities, and peculiar organic disturbances.

Those things are known only to women, and the aid a man would give is not at his command.

To treat a case properly it is necessary to know all about it, and full information, many times, cannot be given by a woman to her family physician. She cannot bring herself to tell everything, and the physician is at a constant disadvantage. This is why, for the past twenty-five years, thousands of women have been confiding their troubles to Mrs. Pinkham, and whose advice has brought happiness and health to countless women in the United States.

MRS. G. H. CHAPPELL.

Mrs. Chappell, of Grant Park, Ill., whose portrait we publish, advises all suffering women to seek Mrs. Pinkham's advice and use Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as they cured her of inflammation of the ovaries and womb; she, therefore, speaks from knowledge, and her experience ought to give others confidence. Mrs. Pinkham's address is Lynn, Mass., and her advice is absolutely free.

EXCELLENT PIGGERY.

Description of a Building That, According to Its Designer, Will Soon Pay for Itself.

It has long been a well established fact that pigs farrowed in winter are much more profitable than those farrowed in summer. Many farmers claim that one winter pig is worth two summer ones. With many this could not be true, for the winter pig would usually be a dead one. It may be that for lack of proper preparation some of our readers are just now passing through disastrous experiences in winter pig raising and that they would welcome some suggestions in regard to preparation for another season.

With proper preparation and care, pigs farrowed in midwinter can be raised with as little mortality as those farrowed in summer. In addition to proper feed, the great requisite is comfortable quarters for the sow and youngsters. This can hardly be had without the aid of artificial heat and a building especially designed for the purpose. A farmer of Ohio is preparing for the erection of a building after the plan shown by accompanying diagram. This diagram shows building and adjacent lots. The building is to be 12-sided or decagonal, and is to be divided into 12 apartments of equal size with space about 10 feet in diameter in center. Eleven of these apartments will be used as farrowing pens, and one will be left for a passageway. The greatest diameter of building will be about 26 feet. Floor will be of cement and will be made to slope gradually from center to circumference. Each pen will contain a floor space of about 38 square feet and will be provided with fenders, which will consist of boards so arranged as to project six inches from walls and will be placed six or seven inches from floor. This latter idea is well known and is recognized as being a great aid in keeping sow from crushing her pigs. The youngsters which would otherwise be pressed against the wall find protection under this projecting shelf. The inside ends of pens will be made of wire so as to not resist the heat from a common stove, which will be placed in center of building. A large skylight placed in south side of roof will admit an abundance of light.

The outer series of spaces represent small lots, one for each pen. These are not large, but large enough for the purpose. They are one rod at outer end. The whole will occupy about one-third of an acre and will be built for about $100. In some localities it would cost more, but with careful management we believe it can be built almost anywhere for $150. It can be readily seen that such a building will soon pay for itself. For the purpose designed we have never seen anything to equal it.—H. E. Tweed, in Ohio Farmer.

THE SUPPLY OF HOGS.

It Is Somewhat Below Demand at Present and Prospects for the Future Are Promising.

The man who raises plenty of corn and then raises plenty of hogs to consume it, is putting his product where it will do the most good, says Drovers' Journal. Hogs are relatively high now and according to the best information obtainable the supply in the country is somewhat below the normal at the present time. However, the best posted men on the hog situation have been mistaken on forecasts of this kind and one is bound to admit that the country is large and that it is impossible to get accurate statistics on the growing crop. There are many who believe that the light average weight is an indication that the later supply will be short, basing their judgment on the theory that no heavy hogs are available, because if they were the premium that they are commanding would force them in. Without question the marketing of so many young hogs now means less to come later on, whether the shortage will be serious or not remains to be seen. So far this winter the eastern supply has been quite large, at least large enough to keep shipments down to a comparatively low figure. It is generally believed that this supply has been pretty well marketed and so the coast is clearer for a better demand from this source later on. Perhaps the high price of corn has discouraged many farmers from feeding as many hogs as usual, but even with corn at present prices there could be no better investment than converting it into pork.

Those who have been shearing by hand should study up the economy of machine shearing. One cent for shearing a sheep is a low price, but it is possible with a shearing machine.—American Sheep Breeder.

All young birds like young and tender grass. If they cannot get to it, bring it to them in the form of sod.

DESTROYING CLODS.

It Is a Hard Job, But Perseverance and Good Common Sense Accomplish Wonders.

If you have a piece of hard land to break, which is so baked as to come up in clods, we would suggest that you run over it with a disk or cutaway harrow ahead of plows, and break with very small scooters, says a southern farmer. Do not try to turn such land. If you still have clods do not wait for them to harden, but run a heavy roller or drag over and follow with some pulverizing harrow the same day. An hour or so will do this for each day's plowing. Thus you will pulverize most of them quite easily. Run roller ahead of harrow so as to crush as many as possible, and fasten the others so that they cannot dodge the harrows. It will pay to take time to do this, your crop can be cultivated so much cheaper afterwards; and the yield will be so much greater. Every time you go over with harrow and crushers you will increase the yield of the crop.

We once selected one acre in a 20-acre field, average spot, and plowed and harrowed this acre 14 times right along before we quit. We then planted and cultivated this acre just as we did the rest of the field, running the rows right along through it. The yield was much more than double any other acre. This has continued to be true for five years, in all kinds of crops. All through the growing season this acre can be distinguished as far as you can see the field. All crops grow off quicker and yield heavier. "Culture is manure" is true.

But after all the old proverbs "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" holds good here also. If the hard pan is broken up and the water permitted to go on down, so as not to saturate the soil and remain in it too long, the baking will be prevented. If the baking or running together is prevented the clods will not form. This is as true of bottom land as of upland. Stop the soaking and you will prevent the clodding. One other point is worth considering here. Do not burn any vegetable matter in your farm. Plow it into the soil. This will enrich the soil and prevent the baking and clodding.

BROILERS FOR MARKET.

This Is a Business That Pays Quite Well, If Conducted on Common-Sense Principles.

Some one asked, a short time ago, about rearing broilers for market. First, the breed. It seems from the various reports of broiler raisers, that Plymouth Rocks are almost the ideal breed for the purpose, the only objection to the Barred is the dark pin feathers, which objection does not hold good with the White Rocks. White Wyandottes are hard to beat, also. The idea is to get a breed that will stand forcing and will present a nice appearance dressed at the age you should market for broilers.

The first day they are fed sand, after that they should be fed every two hours during the day. The first week they should be fed rolled oats, millet seed and cracked corn, sweet milk, sand and powdered charcoal; the next week add a mash, and use a greater proportion of cracked corn; the third week and on until marketed, for breakfast feed cracked corn, then chopped raw potatoes. A meat mill is the thing for this, then chopped cabbage, next mash, and last a full feed of cracked corn. Before this last meal no more is given than will be eaten up quickly; if from any cause they fail to be hungry, miss a meal or two. This will generally bring them around all right. The last few feeds before marketing stir cotton seed meal and treacle (molasses) in the mashes; this is to give them the rich yellow color desired.

At the end of the eighth week the birds should average almost, if not quite, two pounds each. Continuing this course, by 15 weeks they should make 5½ pound roasters. It is impossible to get such results from mongrel stock, but of course, should you be compelled to use them, such feeding is bound to result in quick growth.—Emma Clearwaters, in Ohio Farmer.

BETTER THAN "ABOUT RIGHT."

Lesson Taught Thomas King, the Lecturer, by a Lank Yankee of New England.

Thomas Star King, the famous preacher and lecturer, was settled in California at the outbreak of the civil war, and to his influence is ascribed the change of public opinion in that state from lukewarmness toward the northern cause to devoted loyalty. The Overland Monthly has lately published an article on this famous man from which we take an anecdote told about Mr. King by James T. Fields:

Mr. King, with a friend, was making a trip through the White mountains. They were traveling by that most delightful of conveyances—a country wagon. When they stopped a few minutes at the door of a New Hampshire tavern, Mr. King's companion went in to replenish their provision basket, and he remained in the vehicle.

One of the tall, lank, slab-sided Yankees that are always hanging round a New England inn door slouched up to the team and began altering the harness, slacking a strap here and lightening a buckle there, all unasked, until Mr. King got impatient at the length of the operation, and said, rather sharply:

"You needn't trouble yourself any more. I think the harness is about right."

The Yankee finished his work and drawled out: "Guess right's better'n abeaout right."

There was no reply to this. Mr. King's friend returned, and he drove off, confessing to a lesson which he needed to learn less than most of his countrymen: "Right" is better than "about right."

Good Opinion of Himself.

When Thomas Hart Benton, the noted Missourian, wrote his famous work, "Thirty Years in the United States Senate," which everyone praises and no one reads, his publishers wrote to him asking how large a first edition should be printed. His reply was: "Sir: They can ascertain from the last census how many persons there are in the United States who can read, sir." And that was the only suggestion he would ever condescend to make. Benton was massive in body and muscular. No man in public life was his equal in physical strength, endurance and courage. In reference to a quarrel in the senate, he once said: "I never quarrel, sir; I sometimes fight, sir; and when Benton fights, sir, there is always a funeral, sir."—Chicago Chronicle.

MISS LUCY ANNIE HEISER, OF MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Miss Lucy Annie Heiser, a graduated nurse of nine years' experience, trained and graduated from the Homeopathic Hospital of Minneapolis, Minn., writes as follows:

Albert Lea, Minn., Nov. 8, 1899.

The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, Ohio:

Gentlemen—"Although my school does not believe in patent medicines, I have found it to be a fact that Peruna is a grand and valuable medicine. I have known it to cure Mrs. Sampson, suffering with an inflamed womb, aggravated by malaria, after the doctors had failed to help her. Another of my former patients suffered with a complication of female diseases; she was so thin, nothing but skin and bones, but Peruna cured her and she is to-day in good health and good flesh. Facts prove that Peruna revives lost strength and restores to the sick that most wonderful blessing of life—health."

If all the tired women and all the nervous women, and all the women that needed a tonic would read and heed the words of these fair ladies who have spoken right to the point, how many invalids would be prevented and how many wretched lives be made happy.

Peruna restores health in a normal way.

Peruna puts right all the mucous membranes of the body, and in this way restores the functions of every organ.

From Mrs. Amanda Shumaker, who has charge of the Grammar Department of the Public Schools, of Columbia City, Wash., also Past Grand of Independent Order of Good Templars, Dr. Hartman received the following letter:

COLUMBIA CITY, WASH.

"I can speak only good words of the repeated benefits I have had from the use of Peruna.

"Too constant application to work last winter caused me to have severe head and backache and dragging pains. I could not stop my work, neither was I fit to go on. Reading of the beneficial results from the use of Peruna I purchased a bottle and within a few days after using it, began to feel better.

"I constantly improved and before the seventh bottle was completely used, all pains were gone, my strength was restored, and I now seem ten years' younger.

"If I get tired or feel bad, Peruna at once helps me, and I feel you deserve praise for placing such a conscientious medicine before a suffering public."

Mrs. Amanda Shumaker.

Mattie B. Curtis, Secretary Legion of Loyal Women, Hotel Salem, Boston, Mass., writes:

Mattie B. Curtis.

"I suffered for over a year with general weakness and debility, manifested especially in severe backache and headache.

"My physician prescribed different medicines, none of which seemed to help me any until a club associate advised me to try Peruna as it cured her of constitutional headache and stomach troubles. I at once ordered a bottle and before it was used, felt greatly improved.

"I have taken four bottles and for two months have been entirely free from these maladies. Several of my friends are using Peruna with beneficial results, especially in cases of troubles with the kidneys and other pelvic organs, together with weaknesses peculiar to women."

Peruna is a specific for the catarrhal derangements of women.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

Bowels Don't Move?

Caused by over-work! Over-eating! Over-drinking! No part of the human body receives more ill treatment than the bowels. Load after load is imposed until the intestines become clogged, refuse to act, worn out. Then you must assist nature. Do it, and see how easily you will be cured by CASCARETS Candy Cathartic. Not a mass of violent mercurial and mineral poison, but a pure vegetable compound that acts directly upon the diseased and worn out intestinal canal, making it strong, and gently stimulating the liver and kidneys; a candy tablet, pleasant to eat, easy and delightful in action. Don't accept a substitute for CASCARETS.

I'll bring a surgeon.—Jeweler's Weekly.

"I have gone 14 days at a time without movement of the bowels. Chronic constipation for seven years placed me in this terrible condition; I did everything I heard of but never found any relief until I began using CASCARETS. I now have from one to three passages a day, and if I was rich I would give $100.00 for each movement; it is such a relief." AYLMER L. HUNT, 1882 Russell St., Detroit, Mich.

Newspaper Frauds.

"Non-partisan" papers, edited by partisans, are the most patent humbugs of the age. In commenting upon public matters they start out non-partisan, but wind up partisan. They are simply frauds. A partisan paper is the more to be admired. It sacrafices patronage for principle. It is more honest, for it does not play for both sides, and does not pretend to be anything than partisan. There is nothing antagonistic to honesty in being partisan, and there is every inducement to dishonesty in being non-partisan or independent. The most despicable object is a partisan who pretends to conduct a non-partisan or independent paper, and then by his acts endorses every principle and policy which his party espouses.—Westminster (Md.) Advocate.

THE offer by a Chicago woman of $1,000 "to the first business or professional man who can prove conclusively that he has carried on his work for a month without lying," comes pretty near being an insinuation that business and professional men are not truthful as a rule. If a newspaper were to imply anything like that it would have a dozen or more libel suits on its hands instanter.

THE Easton Ledger, in an editorial on the necessity of making good county nominations, says: "Remember, it is an easier matter for the Democracy to get beat in almost any county in this State this year than it is to win."

This statement, which we believe to be a fact, should be borne in mind when the Republicans of Garrett county make their nominations this year. No selfish ambition should be allowed to dictate the nominations, but, "good men and true," men who can unite the party and poll the solid vote should be sought and urged, if necessary, to accept the trust. In this way only, can Republican success be assured.

THE editor of the Commoner, sad at heart and bitter as gall, now seeks to nominate Associate Justice Harlan as candidate for president on the Gold Democracy ticket in 1904. He intimates without reserve that Judge Harlan can and will fill all requirements of those Democrats who seek to Republicanize the Democratic party. Whatever betides, Judge Harlan may take comfort in this that he can do no worse, nor accomplish less than the gentlemen who so gratuitous suggests this nomination.

Tramps and Work.

Just a word about the tramps, who are at this period of the year taking to the road again, in the hope that they may fleece a living out of the goodness of the householders of this vicinity. We have always entertained the theory that work was the cure for this tramp evil. There is no necessity of repeating this argument now, but once in a while there comes such a complete corroboration of our theory that we cannot refrain from passing comment upon it.

Take, for instance, the experiences which have been encountered in the western part of Massachusetts.

Springfield, at its wayfarers' lodge, gives food and lodging to every applicant and compels him to saw a quarter of a cord of wood before leaving. Holyoke and Chicopee give lodgings at the police stations without either food or work. The result is shown in the fact that Springfield, with 61,000 population, entertained 1,472 tramps in 1899; Holyoke, with 40,000, entertained 1,432, and Chicoyee, with 16,000, 2,340. In other words, decent conditions with work are more discouraging to tramps than a police station lodging without food. Moreover, a little detail adds force to this showing. In 1895 it was reported in the newspapers that Chicopee had established a woodyard pile like that of Springfield. The tramps seem to read the papers, for the nightly average of tramp lodgers at the Chicopee police station fell in a week from between 25 and 30 to six or eight. Then when it was found to be a hoax, old members gradually came back.

There is no call for dilation upon these facts. Work cures the tramp evil; no work encourages it. The rest is easy. Make them work and you have a saving of expense and a community safe and free a pest of begging and debauchery.

Training the American Child of Today.

Child study is a fruitful field of investigation. The American child may be considered in a two-fold light—as the school child and the home child. From the first standpoint he is viewed very differently by different students and observers of the problems and conditions of youth. Some think that public school conditions are adverse to the health of children; that they have not due opportunity for physical growth and development; that they must have fewer hours of study. Others go so far as to state that the common school and the private school are for children the most natural places in the world. There are, again, others who declare our schools perfect, giving children every opportunity for mental, moral and physical advancement.

The truth lies between or beyond these views. Public school conditions are not generally adverse to the health of the pupils, nor to their physical development. There are, of course, exceptions, and in almost every school more could in this direction be done than has been accomplished. Every school should be provided with ample play grounds and with a spacious recreation hall for use when outdoor exercise is prevented by inclement weather. Every school should also have all the gymnastic accessories needed for the physical development, according to the best forms, of children of both sexes. Hygienic and sanitary conditions should be rigidly guarded. An abundance of wholesome drinking water should be supplied, and no modern city school house can be complete without ample bathing.

As to study hours, the sound, healthful principle is that all school work should be done in school. The pupil should carry home none of the burdens or anxieties of the school day. For advanced pupilsa judicious course of reading at home may, indeed, be outlined, but no laborious study should be enjoined. We believe that one session a day, broken by at least one-half hour's period of rest or recreation, is quite sufficient. This is especially true of country schools. In these latter, study should be encouraged, the beauties and utilities of forest, field, stream, hillside, sun and sky, with the valuable lessons they convey, should be early impressed on the youth of our rural districts, where it can be so very easily done by any competent teacher. The same study should also take prominent place in the curricula of city schools, whose pupils should, as opportunity may permit, be taken, from time to time to parks and suburbs, there to view nature within close range.

The school buildings should be cheerful, bright and commodious, adorned by pictures and paintings, beautified by color and surrounded by leafy trees, verdant sward, budding flowers. Great crowds of children should not be herded together in one building nor should there be too many pupils assigned to a class. Teachers accomplished, educated, refined, sunny in disposition, righteous in life, should be secured, and to all such liberal salaries paid. The teacher has a most important part to play in the study and solution of the problems of child life, a part second only to that of parents, whose control of the child's home life is the part more of the pulpit than the press to deal with.

The Girl Who Gads About the City Streets.

They have a poor opinion in Kansas of girls who gad. The Emporia Gazette tells that one of its reporters found five Kansas women out gadding Commercial street while the cooking school was in session. These young woman are said to be the daughters of respectable parents, though none of these is rich. The girls are all well dressed—one so overdressed, indeed, that Kansan good folk are wondering what her mother means. This overdressed girl is 17. She declares that she does not intend to learn to cook, and then she will never have to. The fact that her father went through the Bankruptcy Court last year does not affect her—at least, not for any useful purpose. The enterprising Kansan reporter found, on investigation, one of the father's creditors was a baker, to whom he owed $215 for bread, pies and cookies.

The second girl of the quintet boasts that no one can teach her to cook like her mother. Under maternal instruction she has learned how to make ten kinds of candy, four of cake and several artistic creations with whipped cream. She has not yet, however, made such progress as to enable her to know the difference between boiled meat and broiled meat, nor is she yet qualified to boil potatoes with their jackets on. The third girl of this Kansas group of women is described as a snappy little piece, who tells lots of boy stories, constantly making breaks and laughing at them. "She looks at the ground when she walks, and minces along as though she were too nice for this world. She is always grunting on wash day, and her poor mother hasn't had a new dress since 1888, though Myrtle is dressed to kill." This classic description is, of course, from the pen of a Sunflower scribe.

He next turns attention to a young married woman afflicted with the gadding mania. He says: "John Slowby is a railroad man. He has been married three years. He turns his money over to his wife every pay day, and she has bills for canned goods and ready-made food at six grocery stores. Their grocery bill is over $30 a month, and John can't see where it goes. He should look in the slop bucket. Half the food she cooks is spoiled, and none of it is ever made over."

There are a good many John Slowby's in this country and entirely too many Mrs. John Slowby's, but the latter would have no raison d'etre were it not that lazy women can too easily pick up fool husbands. Fool husbands and fool parents are responsible for the prevalence of the gadding woman, who is frequently met in Oakland, as well as anywhere else throughout the length and bredth of the land.

There are here as well as in Kansas "Misses Earlie Rises," whose days are divided into three parts—sleep, sloth and street gadding. This class of girls avoid the cooking school. They are not home builders. They flirt with strangers, and irreverent young men claim that one may love them all after a first visit. This is, at all events, true of the Emporia species; and, possibly, true of her Oakland sister and of the girl who gads everywhere. Open air exercise is good for girls, but the girl whose only school of improvement is the street usually gets down to the standard of the street.

To the Editor of The Republican.

In a late issue of the Garrett Journal reference was made to the reduction in commissions to the County Treasurer.

Please give me space in your paper to state that the reduction was made mostly through my effort; that I will be very thankful for the position; that I have served the people (and the party) faithfully in a position that has paid only about one-fourth as much; that during my term of thirteen years I have taken only two holidays—Christmas Day, 1899, (the day my wife died), and Christmas Day, 1900, and think I should receive nomination without opposition.

Thanking you for your kindness and my friends for their assistance, I am,

THE TROUBLES OF GORMAN.

Afraid to Declare His Candidacy Because of Being Fearful of the Result.

Arthur Pue Gorman, head of the regular hidebound Democratic organization in Maryland, is in a dilemma. He is afraid to declare himself a candidate for United States Senator because he is not sure of winning. The growing opposition to him in his own party in some parts of the State, the fact that the disfranchising election law does not bar as many negroes from voting as was at first expected, and other reasons seem to make Gorman hesitate.

Some of the Democratic party leaders say that he will come out for the Senatorship at the proper time, and that there is no doubt that he will be the unanimous choice of the party. Other Democrats declare that the party cannot secure control of the Legislature or carry the State ticket with Gorman again the issue. It is said that he will define his position within the next ten days.

The splendid work of Senator McComas, Chairman Goldsborough and several of the Republican city leaders in effecting a reconciliation between the Republican factions in Baltimore at the recent meeting of the Republican State committee assures a united front in the campaign against Gorman. It is the belief of the Republican leaders and prominent anti-Gorman Democrats that Gorman will fight to the bitter end.

Democratic party affairs are apparently at sixes and sevens just now. With former Governor Brown trumpeting in clarion tones his warning that Democratic success this fall is dependent upon the standing aside of "gray-beards," the substitution of younger leaders and the subordination of personal ambition to party success; with Mayor Hayes and the city administration sore, dissatisfied and determined to hold aloof from the machine; with J. Frank Morrison and his Crescent club adopting resolutions denouncing the organization make-up and preparing to fight for a change, and with the Bryan Democrats, led by S. S. Field, outspoken in their denunciation of the State leaders, the Democratic skies are, indeed, beclouded. To make the situation more depressing for Gorman, the friends of Governor Smith are industriously circulating his name as that of the proper party candidate for the Senate. An officeholder appointed by the governor announces that the latter would unquestionably be a stronger candidate than Gorman.

According to the Baltimore Sun the prospects of restoring harmony in the ranks of the Democratic party and of the managers now in charge appeasing the Hayes faction seem very remote. Mayor Hayes makes no effort to conceal his own antagonism and that of his friends to the men now in control and to their politics.

The mayor's conversation with a reporter for the Sun, Sunday, suggested the question of whether, under present conditions and with the same men in control of the party's affairs, his friends would antagonize the ticket this fall. The mayor replied with emphasis:

"There is no doubt of it. They will not only antagonize the ticket, but do their best to defeat it. I could not control them."

The mayor suggested that the best way to secure the confidence of the public in the Democratic ticket would be "to put new men on the State central committee from Baltimore city—men who are known not to be controlled by any one man or set of men, but who think and act for themselves."

The mayor also declared Sunday that he knew nothing whatever concerning the conference of his friends, for which invitations have been sent out for Monday night at the residence of Jail Warden Doyle.

"I do not believe," said the mayor, "there is any truth in it. Why, what have they to confer about, anyhow?"

It was suggested that the conference was for the purpose of strengthening their organization.

"In what way do they propose to strengthen it?" asked the mayor.

"Through appointments to places under the city government, it is said. It is claimed there are too many Republicans with positions in the City Hall."

"Well," was the reply, "they will stay where they are as long as they perform their duties satisfactorily. As for myself, I shall take no active part in the coming campaign, as it seems impossible to improve the city government by doing so."

"Mr. Mayor, there is a report that Mr. Doyle will be the Democratic nominee for clerk of the circuit court No. 2."

"Ridiculous," said the mayor. "Mr. Doyle is doing too excellent work at the city jail, where he has reduced expenses one-half. If he were put on the ticket I would help defeat him. He is too good a warden. Besides, he has no such idea and would not take the nomination."

To the Editor of The Republican.

As the time draws near for the primaries and nominating convention of our county to be held I hear the names of a number of our best citizens mentioned in connection with the various offices to be filled in our county this fall. As is well known our State Legislature that is to be elected this fall will elect Senator Wellington's successor, it is very important that Garrett county should be represented at Annapolis this winter with as strong a delegation as it is possible to send there. We are fortunate, indeed, in having, as I believe, as able and strong men to select from to represent us as any county in the State, and I feel sure our citizens will not fail to nominate the best and strongest men for those places.

Among other names I hear mentioned as being well qualified to represent us as Senator from this county is that of Hon. A. F. George, who is, perhaps, as well known as any man in Garrett county, from the fact that he has been an active worker in the Republican party for the past twenty years. Mr. George would make an ideal Senator—one of whom the Republican party and the people of Garrett county generally could well afford to feel proud.

I have known Mr. George personally for more than twenty years and in all that time I don't think we have had a single campaign that he did not take an active and lively interest in. He not only gave his time and attention but his money as well to help further the interests of our county and to perpetuate the Republican party. He is a good speaker, especially in a running debate, and keeps himself thoroughly posted on political and other questions of the day.

Bearing in mind the above facts, is he not just the man we want to represent us at Annapolis as Senator this winter? In electing Mr. George to the Senate this fall our county will make no mistake.

BOARD WANTED—For man and wife near Oakland, convenient for fishing, for one or two months. Please give particulars as to location, price, etc. Geo. C. Sparks, 1510 H St. N. W., Washington, D. C. 1t

Mr. and Mrs. Max Good and family, of St. Louis, arrived in Oakland the first part of this week and will spend the summer here at Mrs. Kepner's. They were accompanied by Mrs. Good's mother.

Warren Choate, Esq., a prominent real estate man of Washington, D. C., has purchased from Rev. T. D. Richards, the Hotel Chautauqua at Mountain Lake Park which is being prepared for the reception of guests. The hotel is delightfully situated and in past years has been quite successful.

June is likely to break a few records in the weather line also. It has already had the hottest June day for ten years and the weather now is as cool and pleasant as can be. In Dakota snow has fallen and all over the Northwest the frost line has been extended.

Minor S. Field, of Kingwood, and his half sister, Martha Watts, of Morgantown, were married Saturday. The county clerk and preacher who married them did not know of the relationship. The West Virginia law provides a penalty of from 2 to 10 years in the penitentiary for half brothers and sisters marrying.

One thing most gratifying in Maryland today is the good news that comes up from every portion of the State. The people in the mountain, foot-hill and lower counties, are devoting themselves to their home duties. The farmers, all over the State, are busy with their industrial duties. As with the farmer, so with the miners, the railroad men, the manufacturers and the merchants.

While the season has been backward this year the number of people arriving here to spend the summer is greater than has been for a number of years. Nearly every summer hotel near Oakland is open for the reception of guests. At Brookside a number have already arrived while at Mountain Lake Park the place is filling up rapidly. The hotels of Oakland have thier share of the patronage also.

Mr. Percy H. Veitch, son of the late Col. John W. Veitch, who has been in Washington practicing law for a number of years, arrived in Oakland Monday afternoon with the intention of locating here permanently where he will continue to practice law. Mr. Veitch has many warm friends in this section who welcome him to his old home and wish for him a successful career. We understand his offices will be located in the McComas building.

The first engine for the Jennings Bros.' extension, running from the foot of Niverton hill to near Bittinger, arrived at Meyersdale and is now in service as a gravel train engine on a section of that road. Two more new new engines will arrive as soon as the road is completed. The new railroad is nearing completion and when finished will be seventeen miles long, standard gauge, and will penetrate into the richest portion of Garrett county. Jennings Bros. own the best timbered portion of Garrett county and after the timber is cut out they will have a number of coal veins in operation to keep the railroad busy.

The object of the company is to develop the gold and silver mine which is located in Election District No. 11 and from which considerable valuable ore has been taken and flattering assays have been made showing a paying quantity of gold and silver.

Work in developing the property will begin as soon as machinery can be transported to the mine and set up.

The promoters and owners of the property are quite enthusiastic over the prospects of a paying investment.

Killed Her Sister.

News was received here last Thursday of the accidental shooting of Mrs. Mary Lynch by her sister-in-law, at Newburg, W. Va., Wednesday morning. The story of the accident, as learned from railroad men, is about as follows: Miss Lynch, aged about 15 years, daughter of Theodore Lynch, while cleaning out a bureau drawer, came across a revolver. Not knowing the revolver was a self-acting one the girl pointed it at her brother's wife, Mrs. Mary Lynch, who was visiting her father and who was sitting nearby with her little child on her lap, and remarked how easy she could shoot her, when she accidently pressed the trigger, the revolver went off and the ball entered the unfortunate woman's head, killing her almost instantly. The sad affair has caused a gloom to be cast over the little town. Mrs. Lynch was buried at Newburg 9 o'clock Friday morning.

Proposed High School For Garrett County.

The Board of School Commissioners of Garrett county, at a meeting held in their office at Oakland on Tuesday of this week, discussed the advisability of establishing a High School at Oakland into which pupils from every section of the county will be admitted upon the same basis.

It is proposed to set aside one of the rooms in the public school building here for the purpose which will be designated as the High School and to which pupils will be admitted who have completed the sixth grade of study in the public schools, after an examination conducted by a board of examiners appointed by the school board for that purpose.

A term of three years in the High School will fit a student for graduation and the course of study is so advanced and thorough as to include first year in any well conducted college. In this manner it is hoped to elevate the mind of the present growing generation and place before them something to which they can well aspire and not be content with the ordinary public school education. The High School will not detract in any manner from the public schools as a fund has already been provided for maintaining it. As it is absolutely free for the young men and young ladies of the county who can thus secure an education right at home and as thorough as can be secured at any school conducted along the same lines, it should be an incentive to them to work the harder and obtain an education which will fit them for any position offered them.

Farm House Burned.

Tuesday about ten o'clock the farm house at the Jamesson farm adjoining Mountain Lake Park was discovered to be on fire by a man riding along the road who warned the inmates of the house, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Jamesson and their daughter, Mrs. James A. Delawder, of Oakland, and her guest, Miss Peddicord, also of Oakland, who went down the evening previous to remain a few days. The fire started in a section of the house over the kitchen and being dry as tinder the building was soon consumed. Nearly all the furniture, however, was saved. The loss is covered by insurance. Mr. Jamesson is preparing already to rebuild.

Garrett's Incorporated Towns.

William R. Merriam, director of the twelfth census, has issued a bulletin prepared under the direction of William C. Hunt, chief statistician for pogulation, which gives the population of all incorporated cities, towns, and boroughs in the United States.

The number of incorporated places in Maryland is 100, against 73 in 1890. Of these, one exceeds 200,000 population, one is between 15,000 and 25,000; nine between 10,000 one 15,000 and two between 8,000 and 10,000.

Headley, of the Oakland, has completed arrangements for the entertainment of the Elks who will arrive in great numbers this afternoon from West Virginia and the adjoining towns of Maryland. He expects to entertain about 250 members of the order for three days. These will be accompanied by their wives and daughters.

Judge Sloan Returns.

Judge David W. Sloan returned to Cumberland from Atlantic City yesterday evening on train No. 1, accompanied by Mrs. Sloan. The judge is greatly improved and will soon be able to cast aside his crutches which he is still obliged to use, although he is rapidly recovering muscular control. A number of friends were at the train to greet Judge Sloan and there were scores of callers at his home while the telephone bell was constantly rung by inquirers. Judge Sloan will be at home some days but later he expects to come to Oakland.

STATUE OF JULIUS CAESAR.

Great Caesar! It was ne'er
Thy dismal lot to holler
For being forced to wear
A saw-edged collar;
O mighty man, thou couldst pursue thy way,
Care free,
Since 'twas not given men to say
Of thee
That thou didst wear a made-up tie,
Or that thou didst display
A vest
Of ancient style! Oh, why
Should sorrow e'er have found a way into the breast
Of one so drest?

O mighty Caesar! Thou
Didst never bow
Obedient to the hatter's will, as I am forced to now!
Thou didst take from its peg thy wreath, and on that high
Imperious brow
Permit it lightly to repose;
And no old Roman fop turned up his nose
Because the brim
Or crown was out of style!
Ah, what a smile
Had spread across thy features hadst thou known
How men would bend to fashion's every whim,
And groan
Beneath the burdens they must ever bear
Who dare
Not don the things it suits them best to wear.

O happy Caesar! Thou wast ne'er
Compelled to keep a frail
Suspender fastened with a nail,
And thereby hold a pair
Of trousers where
They might serve best the purpose of their kind!
Care
Never sat upon thy dauntless mind
Nor added to thy miseries
Because that fashion bound
Thee in despite of all thy power to wear
Things that were wont to bag around the knees.

Imperious Caesar! No man bade thee don
A coat seamed up the back!
Thou didst put on Thy light and airy toga, caring not
Or if 'twere frock or sack!
Ah, what
A joy was thine
That thou couldst go from day to day
Sans polish and sans shine!
And when 'twas time to put thy summer suit away—
When chilling blasts blew in the fall—
The good Calpurnia could spread
It on the board whereat thou brokest bread,
To deck the same withal.

DOLLY'S DIARY

By Ida Shepler.

(Copyright, 1901, by Authors Syndicate.)

AUGUST 1—I am eighteen to-day. No one seems to remember the fact but myself. I feel that I have lived all of life worth living. I have made two lasting resolves to-day. One is that I will keep a diary of all my doings worth recording each day; the other is I shall never marry. Never. For a long time now I have felt that I must do something noteworthy in life; make some great sacrifice. Suddenly this morning it was borne upon me what it should be. I will be an old maid and devote my life to mamma. Poor mamma. Of course I must look after the comfort and well being of others also, but she first. I have heard that old maids are such a blessing to their family. We have never had one in ours. My aunts and sisters married young. This morning papa set his cup down very hard in the saucer—he must not have been quite well, for usually he is very kind—and said crossly to mamma: "Why in the nation did you change cooks again? That last one made coffee just like my Aunt Mary used to, and she was the boss coffee maker of the family. You are always changing cooks."

Mamma said the last cook was wasteful and not overly clean. And papa said she never did know when she had a good girl. Then he went out without finishing his breakfast, and mamma cried herself into a headache, and I had to sit up with her and bathe her head and soothe her. She said that she did not know what she would do without me. Well, she shall not do without me. I will stay with her forever.

August 2—And when papa came home last night he brought me the loveliest turquoise necklace—just the color of my eyes, he said—and he was sorry that he forgot until almost evening it was his little girl's birthday. Mamma did not act as though a thing had happened, met him with the same smile she always had. But I shall not change my mind. Let me see—the first step toward being an old maid is to look sour at marriageable men. I cannot do that. It isn't my nature to look sour at anyone, but I can avoid them.

August 3.—I'm more than ever now determined to be an old maid. This afternoon I went to see my sister Kate. She has not been housekeeping very long. And, actually, we thought Kate's husband was all that was desirable, but now I am not so certain. She was dusting out his desk when I went in. Presently she untied a packet of business letters to arrange them better and in their midst was a small envelope, directed in a fine handwriting. She opened it and read it, of course. Just then her husband came home.

"Charley," she said, "are you keeping this letter of Nellie Gwynn's because you had not the heart to destroy it? I thought you told me you cared nothing for her."

"Well, I didn't. And that must have slipped in there by mistake," he coolly answered.

"I cannot think Nellie Gwynn would have written such a letter as this to any man unless he had given her reason to think he loved her," Kate persisted.

"Now, look here, Kate, don't make a gilly out of yourself over that letter," Charley said. And then he went out, making no other explanation, and Kate almost cried her eyes out after he was gone. Poor Kate.

August 4—I joined two societies today, the Young Women Helpers and a missionary sewing society. Mamma scolded. Said she did not mind the former so much, but she thought that I had been to school so long that it was time I was taking a rest and having a good time. The idea!

August 5—Sister Kate said for me to say nothing about the words she and Charley had the other day. That she was all to blame, and she never intended to talk that way again to him. Well, I didn't intend to mention it. I called on my best friend this evening, Jennie Jones. We have been bosom friends since we were little tots. She told me that her best beloved cousin, Harry Jones, had come to make them a long visit; that he was out upon the lawn somewhere smoking, and for us to go out and meet him. I said: "No, indeed!" Then I told her of the vow I had taken. My, I would not have believed it of Jennie. How she did talk. We have always thought just exactly alike on everything before this. She said she had always told Harry so much about me, and had hoped that some day I would be her cousin. She said that when he heard this, which she was very sure he would never hear from her, he would set me down as crazy. I gave her to understand that I didn't care what he or any other man thought of me. I knew my own mind and expected to stay with it. Just then her Cousin Harry came in. He is nice looking, just the right height, and the color of hair and eyes I admire in a man. But I must quit writing such stuff.

August 8—Forgot my diary for three days. I was so busy trying to learn to make coffee as papa likes it. Jennie and her cousin called on me. Of course I was courteous.

August 12—Jennie's cousin wanted me to go riding with him last evening. I refused. How mamma scolded afterward. Said it would be an honor to be loved by such a man. That in case he cared for me, I would make a better match than all my sisters before me. I told her I thought she understood my life was to be devoted to her, and that I never intended to marry. She looked blankly at me a moment, and then said I was too pretty for such a fate as that. And I had thought she would be so rejoiced to know that one girl of all her girls would stay always with her.

August 13—Mamma must have told papa of my resolve. That wasn't one bit nice of her; for this morning he kissed me and said he was so glad that I was going to be his sensible little girl and always stay at home with him. He said that old maids were the most sensible of women. Now, then, that isn't fair. I never made up my mind to be an old maid for his sake. Last night as I came out of the hall where the Young Women Helpers meet, there was Jennie's cousin waiting to escort me home. This must not happen again.

August 25—Well, dear old diary, how I have neglected you. I feel guilty. I must do better in the future. It seems to me that Jennie and Kate and mamma and everybody have entered into a conspiracy to keep me going to picnics and all sorts of rural amusements and games, and Jennie's cousin is always around, and he don't try to hide his partiality for my company in the least. If I had not made up my mind as to what is the right thing to do in this world, I would be pleased with his interest, for he is so handsome and jolly—and intelligent, which is better than all else—so mamma says.

August 26—I shall stay right with my diary, my missionary work and my resolve. Harry brought Sadie Binkley to the play last night, and walked home with Nell Gwynn from the tennis grounds to-day, and Jennie whispered to me that she fully believed Harry admired Nell Gwynn. Mercy me. How can he? With her bold ways, her stubby nose, and the record she has as a notorious flirt. Besides, she is older than he is. What does a man want with a woman older than himself?

September 5—Old diary, I had almost forgotten you again. I suppose we must part company, for I would not want you lying around accusing me of inconsistency. Harry and I are to be married Christmas. When he came last night to tell me he was going home, I felt almost like crying. But when he told me that he loved me, I acted like a silly, I know, and I actually did cry and tell him I loved him, too. Mamma will have to do without me. I am not caring so much now about her missing me as papa. But then he left his parents when he married.

The United States imported $7,500,000 more silver from Mexico in 1900 than in 1899.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

Four of the city of Dublin steam packet boats travel at 23½ knots an hour—the same pace as the Deutschland.

Now a French scientist announces that he has discovered a method of producing X rays without the use of electricity.

The Bengal government has formally agreed to grant an additional subsidy of 50,000 rupees for three years for further chemical and scientific researches with regard to indigo cultivation.

A full-length marble statue of Dr. William Gilbert, the father of electrical science and author of "De Magnete," is to be erected at the instance of the members of the medical profession at Colchester, his old home.

Dr. Ludwig Mond has discovered a method for producing illuminating gas at an expense of four cents per thousand feet. It is thought that this will effect a revolution by cheapening electric power, and it will also have an important bearing on the production of open-hearth steel.

Capt. Bernier, whose scheme to organize an expedition for the discovery of the north pole is now before the Canadian government, has received a letter from Lord Minto, the governor general, stating that he has much pleasure in publicly becoming a patron of the arctic exploration scheme.

The dielectric strength of ice increases with a falling temperature, and is more particularly effective against intermittent currents or those alternating at high rates. Tesla suggests inserting a transformer in a freezing jar, and has patented a system of underground conductors where the two mains are the flow and return pipes which carry a cooling material, the pipes themselves being buried in wet cement or water, in a trough.

THE SICILIAN OMERTA.

Unwritten Code of Honor That Prevails in Italy's Southern Island.

It is this unwritten code of honor which constitutes the Sicilian Omerta. We have seen how from his earliest infancy the Sicilian youth is trained to believe that his hand must be against every man, and that every man's hand must be against him; and, indeed, it is impossible to study Sicilian history from the earliest times until the collapse of the iniquitous rule of the Bourbons without being obliged to admit that the Sicilian of the middle and lower orders had ample cause to entertain this demoralizing conviction, writes Richard Bagot, in National Review. I have said that the principles of the Omerta are contained in an unwritten code, but at the same time there exists various popular maxims in the Sicilian dialect which throw a lurid light upon its moral factors. Some of them it may be worth while to reproduce here:

"Whosoever deprives you of the means of existence, deprive of his life."

"A gun and a wife are not lent." (It may be observed that the gun is mentioned before the wife.)

"If I die they will bury me; if I live I will kill you."

"An influential friend is worth more than a hundred onze (1,250 francs) in the pocket."

"Prison, illness and want prove the heart of friends."

"The gallows are for the poor, the law for the weak man (i. e., for him who cannot take the law into his own hands)."

The above examples, taken from a mass of popular dicta, afford some insight into the principles which guide the Sicilian of the working and middle classes through life. To those who know the character of this people they are maxims terrible in their cynical contempt for justice as meted out by the law, and full of savage significance. There is not wanting in some of them a note of pathos and a ring of chivalrous devotion to a companion in distress.

Last English King in Battle.

The last English king who fought on a battlefield was George II. The battle of Dettingen, in Bavaria, on June 16 (27 O S), 1743, between the British, Hanoverian and Hessian troops (52,000 men), under the command of George II., and the French troops (60,000 men), under Marshal Noailles, resulted in the victory of the allied troops. On the morning of the battle the king appeared in the same red coat he had worn at Oudenarde, 35 years before, taking his place at the head of the seven battalions of guards. About noon he ordered a general advance, and, during the movements it entailed, he was very nearly taken by the enemy, but was rescued by the Twenty-second regiment who, in remembrance, wore a sprig of oak in their caps upon the anniversary of the battle for many years afterward. —Stray Stories.

Sultan Stopped Drinking Milk.

In the opinion of the sultan of Turkey fresh milk is a most beneficial aid to good health, and up to a short time ago he was in the habit of drinking large quantities of it every day. Each morning the cows were brought in front of his windows to be milked in order that there would be no mistake about the milk being fresh and pure. Some evil-minded official, however, quietly hinted to his majesty one day that his method of obtaining fresh milk gave anyone wishing to poison him an opportunity of feeding the cows on some noxious food. After that warm fresh milk was tabooed by Turkey's monarch.—Chicago Times-Herald.

THE CAMERA IN WAR.

Its Most Important Use Is the Photography of Projectiles and Their Effects on Armor.

Guns, gold buttons and embalmed beef no longer constitute the entire essential equipment of an army.

The camera has taken an important place in the panoply of war, and the official commissioned photographer is of more consequence than nine-tenths of the uniform bearers. Of course, the war photographer is on the field with a definite purpose, which is not the snap-shotting in full uniform of the admirals of the nation's forces. Instead, the newest and most important use of the war camera is the photography of projectiles.

At first the principal use of the camera was in taking photographs of battlefields and fortifications from balloons. Valuable work of this kind was done in the Crimean and in the Mexican wars. Photometry, or land surveying by photographs, was first practiced in the Franco-Prussian war.

The most important service of the camera recently has been in photographing projectiles during flight and the movements of projectiles and their effects on armor plates and other targets. It is ...ans.

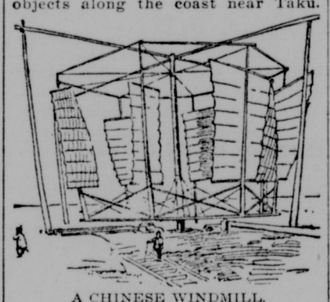
The American soldiers who invaded China last year to rescue the imperiled members of the United States legation noticed a number of queer objects along the coast near Taku.



A CHINESE WINDMILL.

At first these things look like the sails of Chinese junks hung up on frames to dry. But it was afterward discovered that the frames had a rotary motion, and it then became apparent that the mechanism was that of a Chinese windmill. The device was employed to pump up sea water into basins, where the fluid evaporated under the influence of the sun and wind. The salt was then made into cakes and loaves for shipment inland. Owing to the presence of a considerable quantity of sulphate of magnesia in it, the salt had a bitter taste, and also possessed certain medicinal qualities that interfered with its usefulness as a condiment.

The mills themselves were rather unique. They rotated around vertical shafts. The sails, which resembled window shutters with horizontal slats, were inclined to the wind at a peculiar angle. In this and some other details the design was novel to both Americans and Europeans. Whenever a high wind was expected the sails could be furled up or trimmed so as to come to a standstill. The mill was stopped, also, with the aid of a sort of curb or cord applied to the axle. Whether the Chinese windmill is more efficient than the American does not clearly appear.

Infants Require Lots of Sleep.

During the first few months of a baby's life the greater part of the time should be spent in sleep, but the sleep should be a natural one. Soothing sirups or sedative drops given by foolish mothers to an irritable infant to induce sleep are often the cause of disease and death. In most cases a change of clothing and a warm bath are all that is needed to produce healthy sleep, and if this is not effectual the child's diet is probably not right and should be given attention.

Tree Brings Small Fortune.

A mammoth black walnut tree on the farm of E. P. Gaus in Williams county, O., has just been sold for $4,000. Several lumber dealers have examined chips from this tree and all have declared it to be the finest specimen of that kind of wood they ever saw. The tree was eight feet in diameter 40 feet above the stump and extended 73 feet from the butt to the first limb.

PUZZLES PHOTOGRAPHERS.

The Old Question Whether One Part of a Wagon Wheel Moves Faster Than Another.

Photographers in the west, both professional and amateur, are engaged in a wordy controversy as to whether or not one part of a wheel moves faster than another. It is claimed—and a large number of photographs are exhibited to prove it—that when the wheel of a rapidly-moving wagon is photographed the top of the wheel never appears as clear as the bottom. The same is true of a wheel rolled along the ground in front of the camera.

In many cases the developed picture does not show any spokes above the center, says the New York Herald, while all those below the center are clear. On the other hand, it is said be absurd to pretend that the top the wheel can go faster than the ttom.

CAUSE OF CONTROVERSY.

The mystery has been explained in s way—as a matter of fact, the of the wheel does actually move ter than the bottom, that is, in reion to the ground. The bottom f of the wheel has only a vertical tion, while the top has a rapid, rizontal motion, much faster than hub or the wagon. With a time posure, therefore, the bottom kes show clear, while those above center are blurred.

TIES ARE EXPENSIVE.

ow to Make Them Last Longer a Problem Which Railroad Men Are Trying to Solve.

It is impossible to estimate, except aguely, the number of railroad ties use in the United States, but a single road, the New York Central, replaced 1,800,000 old ties with new ones last year, the Erie 400,000 in New York state and 900,000 on its whole line, the Delaware-Lackawanna 150,000, and other New York roads in like proportion.

On all the roads of the country fully 75,000,000 new ties are required for renewals, extensions and additions each year and this entails a vast use of railroad materials, is a steady drain upon the available lumber supplies and costs, moreover, a large sum for labor and hauling. Much ingenuity has been expended on projects for retaining wooden ties longer in use than is possible at present.

The standard American railroad tie is nine feet long by eight inches deep and eight inches wide, and a fairly hard wood is required to prevent the rails from sinking and from becoming displaced. Oak, chestnut, locust and cedar are the usual cross ties.

Many attempts have been made to treat the ties so as to prevent decay of the wood. Some years ago the cross-ties used on the Reading railroad were notched where the rails crossed them and their ends dipped in coal tar. It was supposed that the tar would preserve the ends from decay. Since then another process by which the ties were saturated with a solution of zinc has been tried, but it was found too costly.

A railroad tie costs about 50 cents and it is customary to add 25 cents for the labor of putting ties in position, or 75 cents for each new tie. Any plan whereby the durability of ties may be increased without undue expense will be welcomed by railroad men, but so far the problem remains an unsolved one.—N. Y. Sun.

Unique Operation Performed.

Dr. Syfried, the famous surgeon at Berlin, has just received the congratulations of his professional brethren on a successful operation believed to be unique. He removed a portion of a workman's skull pulverized by the blow of an iron bolt, and filled the cavity with bone from the skull of an ox, carefully pared down and carved to fit the hole. The skin was laid over the injury and healed naturally. The patient experienced no ill effects.

New Substitute for Coal.

A workman in a German chemical works has invented a substitute for coal, which costs about 25 cents per 220 pounds to manufacture. Peat is the basis of the fuel. It gives out great heat, burns with a bright flame and leaves no slag and only a small quantity of white ash. The peat is dried, ground by machinery, mixed with chemicals and pressed into brick shape.

New Government Department.

Congress has under consideration the establishment of a psychophysical laboratory in the department of the interior for the purpose of prosecuting the exact studies on the criminal, pauper and defective classes of our population.

Altitude and Atmosphere.

It is estimated that at an altitude of over 60 miles the atmosphere will consist of 95 per cent. hydrogen. It is suggested that this may be the source of the occluded hydrogen usually found in meteoric fragments.

THE SASKATOON DISTRICT.

One of the New Western Canada Districts—The Great Advantages of Settlement Where the Soil Is of Unexampled Fertility.

During the past year or two a large number of American settlers (those going from the United States to Canada), have made homes in the Saskatoon district in western Canada. They have found the climate all that could be desired, and their prospects are of the brightest. In writing of it a correspondent says:

The lands for sale are choice selections from a large area, and every farm is within easy distance of a railway station. Experience has shown that this district enjoys immunity from summer frost, from cyclones and blizzards. The South Saskatchewan, flowing through the tract, is one of the finest rivers in the country, being navigable and having an average width of stream of 1,000 feet.

The agents of the government of Canada, whose advertisement appears elsewhere in your paper, and who will be glad to give full information, tell me that within the limits of the tract there are two distinct varieties of soil. One is a rich black loam; and the other is a somewhat lighter loam, containing a small admixture of sand. There appears to be no appreciable difference between the fertility of these two kinds of soil. Both are alluvial in their characteristics; both are marvelously productive, and both rest upon a sub-soil of clay. The advantage of this formation is that it retains the heat of the day during the night, and is favorable to the early maturity of crops. Every kind of crop will here attain the highest perfection of quality. The land is admirably adapted for stock raising and dairy farming, as well as growing grain. Some idea of the richness of the natural grasses of the prairie may be formed from the fact that more than 200 tons of hay were gathered within a short distance of Saskatoon and stored up for use during the winter. A growth so luxuriant demonstrates beyond all possible question the suitability of the land for pasturing cattle, and no doubt this important industry will be largely carried on.

Nature has been lavish in her gifts to this territory. Not only is the soil of unexampled fertility, but the climate is delightful and healthy. Such is the testimony of every settler, and this testimony is confirmed by enthusiastic opinions from every traveler, explorer, missionary or newspaper correspondent who has ever visited this far-famed Saskatchewan Valley. In former years vast herds of buffalo came here to winter from the elevated storm-swept regions south of the United States boundary line, proving thereby the adaptation of these rolling prairies to the purpose of raising stock. The land is dry, with sufficient, but not excessive, rainfall, capable of early cultivation in the spring, and free from summer frosts. The configuration of the country renders artificial drainage unnecessary, and prevents the accumulation of stagnant pools; mists and fogs are seldom seen. The days of summer are full of sunshine, under the genial influence of which crops rapidly ripen. Autumn is characterized by an almost unbroken succession of fine weather, during which the crops are safely garnered. In winter it is cold, but extremely exhilarating and pleasant, owing to the wonderful dryness and bracing qualities of the air. The winter is a source of profit as well as enjoyment to the people, being far healthier than a humid climate.

Water and fuel, these two prime necessaries of life, are plentiful throughout the district.

WOMAN RACES AGAINST TIME.

Charters a Special Train to Catch a Steamer at San Francisco.

Miss Margaret Windeyer, of Sidney, Australia had an expensive race to catch the steamer Sierra, which sailed the other morning for the antipodes. Miss Windeyer was coming across the continent to take the steamer, and late in the afternoon of the day before the steamer sailed she learned that the train would not reach San Francisco until three hours after the boat had sailed.

She was determined to get the boat. She had to reach Sidney by a certain date or lose much money, because of some legal contract. "Get me a special train," she told the conductor. A locomotive and one car brought her to San Francisco from Wadsworth, just three minutes before the Sierra was to move from the wharf.

One of Traffic Manager McCormick's young men was waiting with a carriage, into which he hurried the young woman, and the hack was furiously driven to to the wharf. The hackman obtained five dollars for his skill.

The Cloth of Fall River.

Fall River easily leads all other cotton manufacturing centers in America. It has about one-fifth of all the cotton spindles in the United States, and more than twice as many as any other industrial center in America. It makes 843,000,000 yards of cloth annually. Every working day its mills weave more than 1,500 miles of cloth. If all the mills could be run on one piece of cloth the fastest express train could not travel fast enough to carry off the piece as it is woven, since the product is more than two miles a minute.—New England Magazine.

HAVE NO VACATIONS.

Justices of the Supreme Court Busy the Year Around.

When Not in Session at Washington They Either Act as Circuit Judges or Else Are Preparing Opinions.

[Special Washington Letter.]

"THE United States supreme court never takes a vacation," said Senator Stewart, of Nevada.

This seemed like a paradox, in view of the fact that we were talking about the official announcement that the high tribunal was about to adjourn, and actually take a vacation. By way of explanation Senator Stewart said:

"I've been acquainted with the supreme court for well-nigh 40 years, and have had many cases before that august body. It is, and always has been, an aggregation of great men, all of them great workers. Matt Carpenter once said to me: 'I never knew a body of lawyers who were such gluttons for work. They seem to revel in it.' What I mean and what Carpenter meant is that the chief justice and all of the associate justices are hard at work every day in the year, no matter whether the court is in session or not."

From that view point the sweeping statement of Senator Stewart is correct. Young lawyers throughout the land may envy these eminent gentlemen who receive $10,000 per annum for life; particularly when they read in the newspapers that the court has adjourned for three or four months at a time. They do not know that the chief justice, and each member of the court, takes with him a number of cases, upon which time and talent must be expended in order that comprehensive reports may be made as to law and fact, so that their conclusions may meet with the approval of the court as a body when it reconvenes for its next session. Their lives are not easy by any means.

The question of the $10,000 a year does not weigh in the matter at all, for any one of them could earn five times the sum in legal practice, which would not take one-twentieth the time he now devotes to his official duty. The honor of the position, the pride they take in filling it conscientiously, and the realization of the service they perform for their country and the profession is doubtless compensative to them, and furnishes sufficient inducement for retaining their positions.

Very few people, in fact very few lawyers, realize to what extent the duties of the members of the supreme court weigh them down with arduous and exacting details.

When the court is in regular session the chief justice and associate justices meet at the capitol every Saturday for consultation. They assemble in a little room set apart for that purpose. Up to this point the lawyers are well informed concerning each case; but here the public may not enter, and interested parties can only surmise. The consultation chamber is the holy of holies, where profane foot dare not tread, curious eye may not rest, and, more than all, where no inquisitive ear can listen. What goes on within these walls is a secret locked in the breasts of the members themselves, and they never tell. It is surmised, however, that in this room and at this time the members of the court express their individual opinions upon each case at issue and reach conclusions on it. The chief justice thereupon designates one of his associates to prepare the opinion of the court to be delivered at some future day.

Each associate justice having now received authorization to present the opinion of the court upon a case, proceeds to draw it up, and this is a matter requiring care and deliberation, with rare choice of phrase in laying down the law. He knows that this opinion will be read by every lawyer in the country; will be criticised and scrutinized with keen eye and discriminating mind; and he must make it proof against assault for his own pride's sake. Moreover, this is to be the law of the land henceforth upon this particular subject, and he would like to have it stand as a monument to his ability. He realizes that the opinion to be presented may be quoted during this century, and in future centuries. It is a great and grave responsibility.

He is required to consider and digest the argument made by the attorneys and to make up his mind on the questions presented for his decision. In his argument the attorney made numerous citations of law, of references and precedents, which the associate justice must look up and verify, as he cannot afford to trust anything to the attorney's say so. It may have been a forced interpretation or application that the zealous attorney made of the citation, and this must be examined. He feels also that he must be thoroughly posted on the subject when it comes up for discussion in the privacy of the consultation chamber, for it is a point of pride with him that he must know as much about it as any of his colleagues. He has an office at his residence, with a reference library of standard legal works and law reports. The government furnishes him a secretary, who must be an expert stenographer and who attends him at his house. For a couple of hours or in the morning the work of exam ing citations proceeds, the det varying with the nature of the c In the evening he puts in his l work on the case in hand, and if i an interesting one will probably k at it until a late hour. Perhaps has his secretary read him the ci passages or the provisions of the l or the record of the lower court u which the case was argued, while ponders the matter from an e chair. This is continued until he l absorbed clear ideas of his own what ought to be the decision in t case. All of this, mind you, bef he begins to prepare to write the u mate decision.

Before any case is argued befo the supreme court the lawyers a required to file briefs, fully settin forth their contentions; and the ju tices depend more upon these printe briefs than they do upon any oral ar guments which may be made in open court. The arguments which are delivered are always prosy, uninteresting to laymen and devoid of oratory. Attorneys confine themselves to citations of law and of fact, because there is no jury to influence, and they know that the stern and solemn justices would quietly resent any attempt to affect their judgments with rhetorical flights or with oratorical exclamations for dramatic effect. For these and many minor reasons no oratory is ever heard in the supreme courtroom. Grover Cleveland, Benjamin Harrison and others of eminence have been heard there by the writer, but all of their arguments have been delivered in a conversational monotone.

Now when the supreme court adjourns for a term the associate justices do not go home, nor take trips to seashore or mountain. On the contrary, they pack their trunks, not only with clothing, but with pending cases, and proceed to go on their circuits and resume their judicial duties in various parts of the republic. In their capacity as circuit judges they conduct courts of appeals for the various circuits, and herein their duties are onerous as well as of great responsibility. There are many cases tried before the courts of appeals which are left for final hearings when the associate justice shall preside. In the event of dissatisfaction with the decisions reached under such conditions appeals may be taken to the supreme court. Here again is the burden of responsibility felt, because the traveling associate justice must give to each case such consideration that his decision will be sustained by the full bench if an appeal shall be taken. Consequently it is exceedingly rare that any decision of an associate justice, presiding over a circuit court of appeals, is ever overruled by the supreme court. This is a fact which younger practitioners might do well to file away in their memories, for it may save them a great deal of time and the waste of much talent in the future when they have cases before the circuit courts of appeals, with associate justices of the supreme court presiding and deciding issues of law and fact.

In these circuit courts there are cases pending in which are involved many millions of property of individuals and of states, and also cases involving human life. It needs no elaboration to demonstrate that these cases require careful study; and then remember that there is a trunk containing a lot of other important cases which must be studied in leisure hours, if there ever are any leisure hours. The cases in the trunk are for the supreme court, and some of the opinions to be reached and written can be the result only of exhaustive research, requiring delving and study with logic and careful reasoning. Some of these forthcoming opinions must necessarily be of great length, for the supreme court must be intrenched in an impregnable citadel of precedents and references.

And so the days and weeks and months go by until the October term begins. Nobody sees any manifestations of the work which has been in progress, and nobody realizes it, even when the decisions are handed down day after day. SMITH D. FRY.

HOPI BASKET DANCE.

Begins with Devotions Around a Curiously Wrought Altar.

Married Women, Maidens and Young Girls Take an Important Part in the Quaint Ceremonies of the Lalakonti.

[Special New Mexico Letter.]

WINTER is especially the time when the Pueblo Indians of the southwest indulge in their religious ceremonies. They are religious at all times of the year, but especially so in winter. The reason for this is not far to seek. In the spring and summer they are kept busy digging their irrigating ditches, preparing the ground and planting their corn fields, herding their horses, sheep and goats, repairing their houses and doing the thousand and one other things that the pleasant days call them to do.

But in winter, when the cold winds from the north sweep over their exposed mesa heights, and, sometimes, the snow covers with its white pall the surrounding country, when days are short and nights long, then is the time when the Hopi and other aboriginal people feel called upon to devote a great deal of their attention to the propitiation of the powers of good and evil. Every month sees its special festivals and attendant ceremonies. All [illegible] have their secret rites as well festivity, jollity and pleasure. To the Indian it is a serious, sacred and religious rite. From time immemorial the gods have required human beings to dance in order that their anger may be appeased, so every Indian engages in the dance as one of the most sacred and serious things he can do.

The Lalakonti dance is the open-air conclusion of nine days of secret observances, all of which have taken place in the underground kiva. This kiva is a chamber hewn out of the solid rock, and each clan or organization has its own individual kiva. At the beginning of the secret rites an altar is erected, shown in an accompanying engraving.

It is before this altar that prayers are recited, hymns sung, sacred smoking indulged in, until the kiva is full of smoke, and certain dramatic representations occur which are supposed to be very efficacious in the production of rain.

For nine days these ceremonies continue, then everybody on the outside as well as the participants on the inside begin to make preparations for the final outdoor ceremony.

And there is no doubt about the ability of these Indian women to successfully carry through any ceremony that they may undertake. I have been present at the New Year's day annual function of the celebrated "Sorosis"—the mother of clubs—and while every movement of the distinguished ladies who conducted the ceremonies on that occasion (the only one in the year when men are admitted to the sacred precincts of Sorosis), they were not more decorous and dignified than were the Hopi women in the whole of the proceedings I am about to describe. Led by the chief priestesses, the women march in line from their sacred underground chamber. From their headdresses, or the manner of doing up their hair, one can see that there are married women, maidens and young girls. All alike are clothed in ceremonial blankets, much coveted by collectors, made of white cotton, with beautiful red borders. It is apparent that the dancers all feel they must make the best possible appearance on this occasion, for they wear all the earrings of turquoise mosaic, bracelets and finger rings of silver, and necklaces of wampum, turquoise or silver they are the possessors of or can borrow from accommodating friends.

As they approach the dancing place a circle is formed, and then very softly and sweetly a peculiar song is sung—sometimes so gently that the listener can scarcely hear it, and again swelling out into a fair volume. It should have been noted that as the women marched into the dance plaza each carried a beautiful basket, a large flat plaque made of willow, the skeins of which are brilliantly colored in many different hues and then woven into geometric and symbolic designs that are both novel and striking.

Now, as they begin to sing, they raise these baskets, rhythmically but not simultaneously, first to the left breast then to the other, then to the level of the hips, at the same time bowing easily and gracefully in time with the song. It is a pretty sight; the beautiful red bordered white blankets, the glistening of the silver ornaments, the brilliantly colored baskets, the rhythmic, stately movement, all combine to make a charming scene.

While this is going on another scene is transpiring in another portion of the dance plaza. Four young maidens, who are to distribute certain presents at the close of the ceremony, are being prepared by the "lakone taka," or priest, who is the only man allowed to take part in the Lalakonti. Followed by the "lakone mana," or maids, the priest advances into the dance plaza. He wears a bundle of feathers on his head, and carries a basket of "hoddentin," or sacred meal, in his hands. Drawing certain figures on the ground with his meal, the maids line up at a certain distance and throw corncobs, to which prayer feathers ("babos") have been attached, upon these meal figures. The priest picks them up, places them in a row on the figures and then the girls advance toward him. He hands back to them the cobs they threw, and then the party advance a little nearer to the dancers and go through the same performance again. This they do several times, while the dancers are busy singing and posturing as before described.

As soon, however, as the "lakone manas" enter the circle there is manifested a greatly added interest on the part of the spectators. The young men leave the housetops and get nearer to the dancers. There is an air of expectancy, which is not at all lessened by a feint made by one of the maids as if she would throw a basket to the spectators. And now begins a merry frolic, quietly conducted on the women's part, but entered into with vociferation and spirit on the outside. The maids pretend to throw to the right, then dodge over to the left, back and forth, while cries assail them of: "Here!" "To me!" "Throw this way!" Sometimes names are mentioned, and a young man in a half pleading tone begs for the coveted basket, only to retire abashed at the jeers of his fellows when the maid refuses to throw at his request.

But when the first basket is hurled into the air, what a scene of confusion and scramble follows!

The dancers, however, do not pay any attention to the struggles that are going on. For, it must be noted, not one group alone, but sometimes as many as half a dozen or more groups are all striving to gain a basket at one time. Now and again the "lakone mana" or gift maiden, will slyly or shyly hand out a basket or a piece of pottery or some other gift to a favored person, and such special gifts do not seem to provoke envy in the breasts of others. That such special favor should be shown is accepted as a matter of course. The women dance their prescribed length of time and then withdraw, but the groups of struggling young men remain, and it is no unusual sight to see the lads drop down one by one from sheer exhaustion, and finally the victor remains alone, his clothing torn to shreds, his body a shining surface of perspiration, his hair as tousled as a mop, and the coveted basket crumpled and mashed out of all shape and usefulness. But the smile of victory denotes that these things are as nothing compared with the joy of possession, or winning the prize. For, not only does the possessor of the basket gain the object itself, but he is supposed to be the recipient of all the blessings prayed for from Those Above by its devout maker.

CHILDREN AT BED-TIME.

At No Other Hour of the Day Can Parents Exert a More Lasting or Higher Molding Power.

Every parent who has been in the habit of reading or talking to the little ones after they are safely tucked in bed will bear witness to the value of this mode of influence. With laying off the clothes, the angers, worries and discontents of the day subside. With the brief season of prayer they fly still farther into the background. And when the little form rests in its bed they seem to vanish out of sight. The body is at rest. The heart is plastic to the touch of a loving father or mother.

Now is the time to exert a molding power. At this hour the little ones listen with hushed attention to what is read to them. Hymns, the Scriptures, Bible stories, are heard with close attention, until the reader's voice is stilled or the hearers sink into gentle sleep; or conversation may take the place of reading. The will that was in a state of resistance an hour ago is now relaxed. The anger that blinded moral discernment has passed away. With open heart the child utters its confessions and gladly receives the forgiving kiss.

Plans for the morrow can be discussed, and duty can be made to put on an attractive form. Irritations can be looked at quietly, and admonitions to watchfulness may be dropped with soothing efficacy into the listening ear. And then how delightful the embrace with which the young arms clasp your neck, the intense "dear mother" with which the "good night" is said. Parents, if you have not thus parted from your birdlings at the evening hour, you have something yet to learn of love's delights.—Leslie's Weekly.

COUNTESS OF WARWICK.

Famous English Beauty Is Now Devoting Her Time and Fine Talents to Charity Work.

When King Edward succeeded to the throne of Great Britain the impression prevailed in court circles that the beautiful countess of Warwick would exercise great influence in the management of state affairs. The countess is a woman noted for brains, whose undertakings in business and charity have been eminently successful. King

THE COUNTESS OF WARWICK.
(Said to Be the Most Beautiful Woman in Great Britain.)

Edwards entertains the highest regard for her, and as prince of Wales consulted her whenever he encountered difficulties. There was said to be no woman of whose judgment he had a higher opinion. The countess had many enemies at court, however, and it is supposed that the king listened to their counsel, as since his accession he has ignored his old-time friend. The countess shocked British society a few years ago by opening a lace shop in Bond street, London, but according to the latest reports she has sold her lace and lingerie business and retired from trade. She is now devoting her time and her fine talents to promoting the education and welfare of country working girls. A rich dowager, whose name thus far has been kept a secret, gave her $500,000 to carry on this work. The countess is establishing schools, homes and boarding houses for the girls, where they are safe and enjoy many advantages.

Mothers Who Are Too Kind.

The so-called "good mother" is too frequently really a bad one. She makes of her children monsters of selfishness, and never ends her voluntary slavery to them. So far as she is concerned, as a mother finds her chief joy in being a constant slave to her boys and girls, no one need complain; but such a course ruins the children. They grow up into selfish, ill-bred, dictatorial men and women, without self-control or discipline of mind or body, and utterly ignorant of that flower of courtesy which each human being should wear forever, fresh and fadeless, making the wearisome places of human life endurable by its charm. The most beautiful girl in the world, if she thinks of herself alone, and shows it by bad manners, merits only contempt.—N. Y. Weekly.

How to Clean a Teapot.

Wash the teapot out thoroughly with boiling hot soda soapsuds, then rinse with ammonia and water, and, lastly, two or three times in clean cold water and dry well. Kept thus, the teapot should be as bright inside as out, but remember to air it well after washing.

MAKING NECKWEAR.

A New and Lucrative Field of Enterprise for the Ingenious and Tasteful Woman.

Among the strictly feminine professions none is just now more lucrative than the manufacture of neckwear. The decoration of tea-cloths and doilies, sofa-pillows and bureau-scarfs with drawn work and floss flowers threatens to become a forgotten art since the demand for pretty hand-made collars, berthas, stocks, etc., far exceeds the supply. Machine-made neckwear the well-dressed woman refuses to accept at any price. To her notion there is a set and a sameness about it that fails utterly to please; she has entirely forsworn the masculine linen shirt collar, and, however simple and tailorish her costume may be, her throat must be dressed with care, taste and originality. Therefore, whatever she ties about her neck must be hand-made, for this more or less shuts out the possibility of wholesale imitation of any particularly nice designs.

One woman who took advantage of this sentiment prevailing among her sex earned a tidy $500 last summer by making every variety of little silk, lawn, linen and lace turn over for fall stocks, and this year she has gone into the lucrative business of making smart tulle collars, roped with imitation pearls, for wear with decollete evening gowns. She also makes irresistible kerchiefs and berthas of lace and chiffon, and sells them readily to women who wish to freshen up their old evening waists at little expense and less trouble. She has improved on the transparent lace stock for this season by welding pieces of tea-tinted lace together, to form a sort of dog collar, and weaving through openings in the fretted band of gold or panne ribbon that ties in a broad-winged bow at the back of the neck.

This woman and her sister manufacturers haunt the remnant counters and pick up invaluable odds and ends for little or nothing; odds and ends, however, that in the true artistis fingers can be converted into the most delightful ornaments for a shirt-waist, a reception toilet, or a ball gown as the need may be; and one of these collar-makers, who keeps herself au courant with the fashions, is preparing a big stock of flat collars. Such collars, a little later on, with country muslins that have bell-mouthed sleeves, the women will adopt, pinning the flat lace boleros for the neck with the quaint cameo brooches that their mothers wore a half century ago.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Housework and the Hands.

When engaged in sweeping and dusting and similar household tasks the hands should be protected with loose gloves. If rubber gloves are not used in dishwashing, a dishmop should be used, to prevent the hands from being so frequently immersed in hot soapy water. After doing rough, coarse work which has begrimed the hands, before attempting to wash them rub in the pores a little vaseline or oil to loosen the dirt, then wash them in hot water and pure soap, using a hand scrubbing brush. Lather them well and remove every particle of grime from about the nails. Turn out the soapy water and rinse them in tepid water and lastly in cold, so that they will not be made too tender. Hard water is very harsh and trying to the skin of face or hands, and boiled, distilled or soft rain water should be used when obtainable.—Chicago Daily News.

Cream of Peanut Soup.

To make cream of peanut soup put half a pint of peanut butter into a quart of milk; add half a teaspoonful of salt, a dash of pepper, a tablespoonful of grated onion, a bay leaf, a saltspoonful of celery seed, or a little chopped celery tops. Cook this in a double boiler for ten minutes. Moisten one tablespoonful of cornstarch in a little cold milk, add it to the hot milk, and stir until smooth and thick. Strain through a fine sieve and serve with squares of toasted whole wheat bread. Nuts are sufficiently oily without adding butter. Any nut or mixture of nuts may be used in the same manner.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Once in Awhile.

Once in awhile in the desert sand
We find a spot of the fairest green;
Once in awhile from where we stand
The hills of paradise are seen;
And a perfect joy in our hearts we hold,
A joy that the world cannot defile;
We trade earth's dross for the purest gold
Once in awhile.
—Nixon Waterman, in Good Cheer.

The Way to Pan Chicken.

To pan chicken cut the chicken up as for fricassee. Put it into an ordinary baking-pan; dust with pepper, partly cover with water and place it in a very hot oven. Baste frequently. When it is half done add a teaspoonful of salt. When quite done, dish and serve with a brown sauce made from the water in the pan and browned flour.—Ladies' Home Journal.

To Redeem Stamps.

The banks have received instructions relative to the redemption of revenue stamps.

An important clause in the instructions is the order that the stamps shall not be redeemed through the banks. Banks have no right to make claims for stamps for their customers, but must own the stamps which they seek to have redeemed absolutely themselves and establish such ownership by sworn testimony. Documentary and proprietary stamps can be redeemed only when presented in quantities of $2 or more.

All stamps and the check books on which stamps are imprinted will be retained with the claims at Washington and none of them will be returned to the owner.

The law providing for the abolishment of the use of documentary and proprietary stamps issued under the provisions of the war revenue act of 1898 goes into effect July 1.

Application for the redemption of such stamps should be made to the collector of internal revenue from whom the same were purchased, who will supply the applicant with form 38 and necessary instructions relative to the preparation of his claim.

Attractive Women.

All women sensibly desire to be attractive. Beauty is the stamp of health because it is the outward manifestation of inner purity. A healthy woman is always attractive, bright and happy. When every drop of blood in the veins is pure and beauteous flush is on the cheek. But when the blood is impure, moroseness, bad temper and a sallow complexion tells the tale of sickness, all too plainly. And women to-day know there is no beauty without health. Wine of Cardui crowns women with beauty and attractiveness by making strong and healthy those organs which make her a woman. Try Wine of Cardui, and in a month your friends will hardly know you. 1t

HIS LIFE SAVED

By Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy.

"I am sure that Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy at one time saved my life," says A. E. Lafalette, of Gregory Landing, Clark county, Missouri. "I was in such bad shape that the doctors said I could not live. When I was at the lowest ebb, one of my neighbors brought in a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy and I took it and got instant relief. I soon got up and around. That was nine years ago and I am still in good health. Since then that medicine has always been in my house and always will be. It is the best on earth." For sale by all dealers.

EMPEROR WILKES

TIME, 2.28.

Will stand at the stables of the undersigned in Oakland on the following terms:

$10 to Insure a Mare With Foal.

Money to be paid when mare is known to be with foal. Persons parting with a mare or fails to attend forfeits insurance money. A lien will be retained on the colt until insurance is paid. We will not be responsible for accidents should any occur, but the best of care to prevent such will be exerted.

This horse has a record of 2.34. On a trial he trotted a mile in 2.28. He is a full brother of WILL KERR, 2.07¼, Champion Green Harness Horse of the World, and also of VINETTE, 2.09¼.

EMPEROR WILKES is a dark bay stallion, snip on nose, black points, height 15¾ hands. He was bred by Thompson & Bro., Cynthiana, Ky. He comes from the best trotting family of horses in this country and has a bright future. He is the sire of the fastest colts in Garrett county and is without doubt the best bred stallion and the fastest trotting animal in Western Maryland.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 25. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JUNE 20, 1901. NUMBER 15.

ARTHUR PUE GORMAN.

From Advance Sheets of "Richard Croker," by Alfred Henry Lewis.

Nowhere in appearance does Gorman jar on one. Physically he is neither big nor little; mentally he is much the same. Politics with Gorman is an accident and not a creed. He is a good thinker in the way of egotism; with himself at stake, his impulse acts powerfully as auxiliary to his reason.

In temper Gorman is timid and shy, but ambitious as Bonaparte and as egotistical, his aim is often elevated and the game he hunts is big. Wherefore, much that he does seems daring. What one takes to be daring, however, is naught save the expression of a hunger to have, which, now and then, overrunning itself, carries him into peril. * * *

There is the sharpest of antithesis between Gorman and Hill. Where Hill has valor, Gorman has strategy; where Hill is Dane, Gorman is Hindoo; where Hill becomes Beserk, Gorman turns Borgia, empoisons a bunch of forget-me-nots and sends it to his enemy with a love-note full of heart regard and warmth. * * *

Gorman has no profession, no trade, and some education. His calling is politics, his purpose to hold office, his object to become rich. He has had success. He was Senator from Maryland, and is worth two millions of dollars. Gorman made politics pay. * * *

That he is master of a wool-foot cunning appears from his winning the tariff without noise, or fury, or the disclosure of his own convictions on that point of cardinal politics. No one knows nor does his record show whether Gorman is for protection, a tariff for revenue, or free trade. * * *

That Gorman will snap when cornered was indicated in his Senate speech assailing Cleveland. And that he lacks a common courage is told when he talks with Cleveland for half an hour on the morning of the day the speech is delivered, and does not mention its approach to that President most interested. * * *

Cleveland was nominated for the Presidency, Gorman, who had fame for dexterity in practical politics—with the face of a prelate and the heart of a privateersman—was put in front of the forces of the party. The Republicans, however, were not disheartened by the Conkling-Garfield dissentions of the years before. They proposed Blaine, their best and greatest, and went behind their guns with the cool valor of buccaneers. And they all but won.

Blaine lost New York—the White House key in 1884—by fewer than two thousand. And that leader who defeated Blaine was Gorman. The Maryland manager turned the currents in the last hours of the conflict. He saw the trouble; he called on Baltimore for money; he got it to an amount without a name. Thus equipped, Gorman poured that balm the wounded hour called for into the lower wards of New York City; and when the mists of doubt were blown aside success was his. Gorman had made Cleveland President. * * *

Gorman craved three things. And they were denied. Cleveland refused Gorman; and was so roughly plain, withal, that the situation, assenting to no obligation, admitted of no hope. Gorman made no more requests. True to his education, Gorman was patient under insult, meek under the whip. His hates did not foam; his resentments were without a tongue. * * *

Gorman went to the Chicago convention in 1892, a full-fledged candidate, but undeclared. Hill's coming defeat was already apparent. Gorman's friends took with them twenty thousand Gorman badges, silk and gold, great and little. These were to be flaunted opportunely and explode enthusiasm. They were drowned in Lake Michigan and never got out of their boxes.

"If the New York delegation," said Croker, "could have gotten away from its instructions and dropped Hill, we would have beaten Cleveland and named Gorman. But Hill insisted on the delegation wasting itself on him. It was Hill who nominated Cleveland."

It was Gorman who broke. Gorman, losing heart, made his decision for Cleveland. But in its first stage Gorman kept his Cleveland mood to himself. Following the "count," Gorman disappeared. No one found him for two days.

On convention morning, Whitney—who was Reynard the Fox for that convention—was out in an interview, saying that "Gorman was for Cleveland, always had been for Cleveland," and expressing amiable contempt for dullards who had believed anything thing else. Contemporaneously Gorman appeared at Whitney's elbow pegging away for the ex-President. Cleveland was named on the first ballot, with Hill sticking to the end.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The rains of the past week have made many of our summer visitors "a little discouraged."

The Park is rapidly filling up with citizens for the summer. Only three homes not rented.

The hotels are all open for business and several have guests. Joseph Forward is putting Hotel Columbia in splendid order.

The new management at Hotel Chautauqua are preparing for a busy season. The hotel is receiving a general overhauling.

The telephone company are putting in a number of 'phones and friend Smith is happy.

Rev. C. Fisher preached a splendid sermon Sabbath morning last. It was "good for the soul."

Politics are growing quite interesting. Candidates are circulating among us with smiling faces and extended hands. The first to "show up" was Andrew Shartzer, of our own district, a candidate for sheriff. Next came that genial postmaster of Hoyes, William A. Smith, looking after the interests of the telephone company and yet "getting in a word" for our present Senator, who has so ably represented us in the State Senate. E. E. Friend, capable, honest and a good citizen, would accept the nomination for clerk of the Orphans' Court. No better nomination could be made. Hon. A. F. George has been a caller in our midst and is working hard for the nomination. For the legislature that "old soldier," not able to do a day's work because of disabilities resulting from his army life; a good debater is S. E. Flowers. Then for the Senate is one well known over the county—Capt. J. A. Hayden. His record is with us. A representative man, and if nominated would poll a large vote and well represent the county at Annapolis. The captain is at work and hopes to "win the prize." Why not? The 7th district has plenty of candidates for the convention, but after the convention only the nominee of the party.

HIS LIFE SAVED

By Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy.

"I am sure that Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy at one time saved my life," says A. E. Lafalette, of Gregory Landing, Clark county, Missouri. "I was in such bad shape that the doctors said I could not live. When I was at the lowest ebb, one of my neighbors brought in a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy and I took it and got instant relief. I soon got up and around. That was nine years ago and I am still in good health. Since then that medicine has always been in my house and always will be. It is the best on earth." For sale by all dealers.

FEARER.

Everything at our town is prosperous and politics are warming up as the time draws near to make up the Republican ticket. No. 2 could fill up the entire ticket and yet have aspirants left. We have all manner of aspirants. We have the "hang-ons," always in it, win or lose; then we have what I call Republicans that Republicans want and need, men of ability and stability, such as Taylor Friend for commissioner and E. J. Frantz for sheriff. They are men of merit. Now perhaps had better stop right here. But I have no ax to grind. If I had I would get my own boys to turn the grindstone. They know who raised them, so with our party. Let every true Republican go to the primaries and elect delegates to go untrammeled to the convention to make up a ticket of official capacity and honesty that will reflect credit upon our county and party. Let the office hunt the man, not the man the office. But then we are as much inclined to do evil as the sparks are to go upward. I have held office (school trustee) for 37 years, but am out now.

Our new merchant and postmaster, Charles T. Frantz, has made quite an improvement in our town by the erection of a new porch and other repairs. He is doing a booming business. His brother B. W. will teach our school next winter.

Ami Hinebaugh and others are raising money to repaint the Church of God at this place. We wish them success.

Our Sabbath school is progressing nicely under the management of Taylor Friend.

Amos Umbel, our stone mason, is not working at his trade this summer and it tells on his farm. He burnt one kiln of lime this spring and has another ready to put up.

Freeman Savage, our painter, is much crowded with work.

CORKSCREW PHILOSOPHY.

Diversity of opinion helps to develop truth.

What is right to-day may be wrong to-morrow.

He who clings to the past leans on a broken reed.

Onward, onward, ever onward is the motto of every true man.

He is well on his way who has awakened to his needs.

It is useless might if your work is not right.

Keep pegging along with your heart full of song,—the heart of the traveler brightens the weariest road.

An honest opinion marks the sincere man, but blind prejudice warps the judgment—it is a stupid fox that barks in a hen roost.

He is an obstinate man who refuses to believe a self-evident truth. He is a dangerous man who tries to force his belief on others.

Never grieve about wasted effort; the world is full of it; it is man's greatest teacher and the foundation of all true progress.

Judging from the changing of church creeds, all religion would seem to be a failure; but nothing is farther from the truth. Man's belief of a necessity must depend upon his understanding. Man is constantly changing but truth never changes—the light of reason leads us to the lamp of truth; for what is reason but truth.

The New York Sun is seemingly anxious to be on the good side of the gods and goddesses—it is publishing a weekly series of articles on female suffrage. The matter is enough to make an ordinary man take to the woods.

Henpeck says that every time he hears of a female suffrage convention in session he imagines he hears a hundred disconsolate doggies a howlin' for their misses to come home.

JACKSON.

Obituary.

Mrs. Catharine Bancord, wife of John Bancord, nee Koontz, was born September 5th, 1834, in Allegany county, Md., and died June 10th, 1901.

In Garrett county, Maryland, one mile south of New Germany, at the ripe old age of 66 years, nine months, and 25 days, another bulwark of Methodism has fallen. A sainted mother and beloved wife has outstriped her husband and children to the glory world home. The aged will miss her in their circle and the young will miss her counsels. She was beloved by all who knew her. She was sorely afflicted for four years with Bright's disease associated with dropsy. She was a great sufferer yet patient through it all. Her home was the temporary home of all the pastors on the Grantsville charge during the past 35 years. When they were weary they were often refreshed in her home, when discouraged they often took sweet counsel with brother and sister Bancord. The home is now broken, the husband for the present still remains at the old mansion with Mrs. Lewis Warnick, one of his children. There are five of the children living, Mrs. Lewis Warnick, Mrs. C. C. Durst, Mrs. Francis Durst and Mrs. Frank Brook, of Clarksburg, W. Va. Also one son in Michigan.

The funeral was very well attended. The subject of the discourse was taken from Job 14: 20. The sister was a member of the M. E. church for 55 years and was faithful until death. Her remains were laid away to rest in the cemetery of the Mt. Buelah Methodist Episcopal church, near her former residence, to await the glorious Resurrection. She leaves two brothers and one sister to mourn her departure.

Mother, we will wait the summons
From the Angel of the Lord;
Watch for us, we'll soon be coming
With his will we would accord.

Wife, now I am sad and lonely
Since your form no more I see;
I've been waiting thy returning,
But thou cans't not come to me.

Now I will not mourn in sorrow,
Since from earth thou hast been borne,
For my flight may be tomorrow,
E'er the setting of the sun.

Now, farewell, we'll meet in glory,
'Round our Savior's great white throne;
You have helped to write life's story,
And in heaven we'll soon be one.

Unnecessary Loss of Time.

Mr. W. S. Whedon, Cashier of the First National Bank of Winterset, Iowa, in a recent letter gives some experience with a carpenter in his employ, that will be of value to other mechanics. He says: "I had a carpenter working for me who was obliged to stop work for several days on account of diarrhoea. I mentioned to him that I had been similarly troubled and that Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy had cured me. He bought a bottle of it from the druggist here and informed me that one dose cured him, and he is again at his work." For sale by all dealers.

Communicated.

To the Editor of the Republican.

In the past several issues of your paper I have noticed a great many communications with reference to the candidacy of a number who have been put forward for State Senator. In this connection I have as yet to see the name of one who has served the people faithfully and well for some years in the State Senate, Dr. R. A. Ravenscroft, of Accident.

While the gentleman above alluded to has not made an announcement of his candidacy for the renomination it is generally understood that he is in the field for the honors and that should he again be nominated I have no misgivings as to the result of the election and his course at Annapolis.

During the past eight years Senator Ravenscroft has ably represented the people of Garrett county at the State's capital and has shown by his actions that the confidence reposed in him by his constituents has not been violated. He has always stood firmly for the right and has the respect of not only his Republican colleagues of the Senate but the Democratic members also. During the late extra session he did yeoman service in an effort to defeat the passage of the disfranchisement law.

In conjunction with a number of other Republican members of the upper body his efforts to at least change the most vicious sections of the law availed.

In matters of legislation touching the interests of either county or State Senator Ravenscroft has exhibited a keen desire to serve the majority of the people.

From nearly every section of the county we hear reports of this man or that man's chances for the nomination. Almost to a man the leading party workers are averse just at this time to take up an untried man for the responsible position who will be called upon in case the Republicans are victorious to select for the people of Maryland a United States Senator to succeed Senator Wellington whose term will soon expire.

In view of this I for one think that the Republicans should give Senator Ravenscroft their undivided support at the primaries and work for his election at the polls.

Newspaper "Ads" Only.

The merchants of Springfield, Mass., have decided that the best and most profitable means of business publicity is the newspaper. In order that they may be able to buy more newspaper space, they have agreed "not to advertise in any way but in the regular publications." Advertising has ceased to be a form of benevolence in many cities, and has become strictly a matter of business.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. John Williams, a butcher, doing business in Westernport, was drowned last Monday noon while fording the Potomac river between this place and Franklin or Buxton dump. Mr. Williams, accompanied by two companions, Moore and Jones, came to town in the morning and after transacting his business started to return by way of the Junction, where he intended to take orders for meat. When he drove to the river Moore and Jones got out of the wagon and tried to persuade Williams not to risk the ford as the river was very high and swift. He refused and had only driven in the water a short distance when the swift current caught the light spring wagon, turned it over and threw him out. Unable to swim he was carried rapidly down the stream, fighting manfully for his life and succeeded in keeping afloat until one of his companions, Jones, an expert swimmer, unstripped and swam within six or eight feet of him, when he suddenly disappeared and was swept away. The horse and wagon were carried down the river two or three hundred yards and were finally recovered without much damage. Piedmont and Westernport were telephoned at once and searching parties instituted to watch the rapids below Luke to see if body passed down. Up to this time body has not been found. He leaves a wife and one child.

The remains of Miss Anna Ambrose, daughter of Capt. and Mrs. N. M. Ambrose, of Washington, D. C., who died in that city some months ago, will arrive in town some time this week to be interred in the family lot in the Bloomington graveyard. Miss Anna was a teacher in the public schools of Garrett some years ago and was a very popular and accomplished young lady. She accompanied her parents when they moved to Washington.

Some one who was very hard up for something to steal got away with a 90 pound bar of lead on last Saturday night. It was taken from the B. & O. platform and belonged to the contractors on the water line. Mr. Hite came up on Monday with an officer and efforts are being made to locate the thief.

Squire Moody, a director in the First National Bank of Oakland, attended a meeting of the board on last Monday.

The Republican district committee suggested the appointment of an entire new set of officers for the election this fall. Mr. James Reynolds for register and judge of elections, Mr. Jesse Harris for judge and Floyd Duckworth for clerk.

Mr. and Mrs. Bert Wolf, of Wallman, spent Sunday with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Wolf.

The picnics that were booked for this place and the Junction on last Saturday were declared off on account of rain.

Mrs. Maggie Collins and Michael Flynn were called to the county seat on legal business last Saturday.

Great preparations are being made by the children and their teachers for Children's Day services at Cross next Sunday.

An ice cream parlor was opened at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. John Wolf on Saturday evening.

Dr. Kemp was called to Farmington, W. Va., on business this week.

A special day, next Friday, has been set by the county commissioners of Mineral county, W. Va., to pass on bills that have grown out of the late visitation of small pox at Piedmont and West Virginia Junction. It is reported that physicians' fees, maintenance of pest house, nurse hire, medicines, etc., will aggregate something near $3,000. The nurse hire alone for pest house amounts to $400.

The county commissioners of Allegany county, after weeks of weary waiting by a traveling public that had almost grown desperate over the inaction of the road supervisor, have at last completed the bridge over the ravine caused by the landslide at Buxton mine, which occurred some six weeks ago, and we can now travel by horseback or vehicle to our sister towns without depending on crosstie accommodations.

For Rent or Sale.

This property is known as the Bedford property. Will be sold at a bargain for cash. For terms, etc., address Mr. G. S. Hamill. 3

Money to Loan.

$4,000 to loan on first mortgage in n sums to suit upon town property or nearby farms.

EDWARD H. SINCELL.

RICH REWARD FOR STATE.

Maryland Will Receive $88,370 as a Result of the Railroad Suit Compromise.

Attorney B. A. Richmond returned to Cumberland on Saturday evening from Baltimore where he had been engrossed in important litigation, having, with the assistance of the governor, comptroller and treasurer, effected a compromise in the suit of the State Board of Public Works against the Cumberland and Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Confluence and Oakland Railway Company, the Washington County Railway Company and the Pittsburg and Connellsville Railway Company. The action authorized by Gov. Lowndes grew out of a claim for taxes on gross receipts, the taxes running from 1891 to 1900, and amounting to more than $93,000. By the terms of the settlement the State receives $88,370 clear of all costs and attorney fees.

Mr. Richmond, who negotiated the compromise with the railroad officials, and who was associated with Hon. George R. Gaither in conducting the litigation, received, it is understood, a fee of five thousand dollars for his services in the transaction.

A Good Cough Medicine.

It speaks well for Chamberlain's Cough Remedy when druggists use it in their own families in preference to any other. "I have sold Chamberlain's Cough Remedy for the past five years with complete satisfaction to myself and customers," says Druggist J. Goldsmith, Van Etten, N. Y. "I have always used it in my own family both for ordinary coughs and colds and for the cough following la grippe, and find it very efficacious." For sale by all dealers.

PAINTER.

A. F. George has secured a two weeks' vacation from his duties as postal route inspector and is spending the time with his family and friends.

Herman Steiding, who has been suffering from an attack of rheumatism for the past two weeks, is improving slowly.

Charles Wilson is improving his farm with a new dwelling house.

Miss Percie George was the guest of Miss Carrie Lee Sunday.

Mr. Oliver Lee, accompanied by Miss Bertie Hardesty, visited Miss Hardesty's parents, near Bethlehem, on last Sunday.

Messrs. George Friend and Theo. George attended quarterly meeting at Thayerville Saturday and Sunday last.

George Bowen and sister Miss Bertie, of Higginsville, W. Va., are visiting their brother, William Bowen, this week.

Calvin Conn was a welcome visitor at A. F. George's Sunday.

Stephen Wagner, of Piedmont, W. Va., while on his way from here to Altamont last Sunday night, was attacked by some unknown person or persons and received a blow on the forehead which rendered him unconscious for some time and relieved him of about $10 in cash.

His Lack of Directness.

The young man was embraced, but he began bravely:

"It cannot be a surprise to you, Miss Euphebia," he said, "that you, must have suspected, from the length of time I have been coming here, that I—I say it must have been apparent to you for some time that I could have had but one object in view in—although, of course, I can't claim that you have given me any cause to be confident. Still you may have asked yourself what other motive, if any, I could have had, when it must have been evident—and yet—"

"Mr. Billmore," she interrupted, "please be more direct and explicit, if you can. You wabble painfully."—Chicago Tribune.

Keim-Brumbaugh Suit.

Miss Cora Keim's breach of promise case was the subject of arbitration last week. As the young lady presented but little testimony it is evident she means to have a court trial. The finding was favorable to Prof. Brumbaugh under the circumstances. Miss Keim lives at Salisbury, Pa.

THE LOST LETTER

By Anna Pierpont Siviter.

(From Good Literature, Reprinted by Permission.)

"JIMMY!" called Frank Hepburn, the handsome young bookkeeper for Wade Brothers.

Jimmy, the office boy for the same firm, as is usual in such cases, did not hear. It is a singular fact, not yet explained, that deafness is more prevalent among office boys than among any other class of wage earners."

"Jimmy!"

Frank Hepburn called more sharply this time, and Jimmy relinquished his favorite occupation of drawing cats with red ink on the firm's noteheads, and slowly approached Mr. Hepburn's stool.

"Take this letter to the post office and drop it into the box marked 'City,' and be quick, please."

Jimmy took the letter, placed it carefully between his teeth while he put on his hat and coat; he then surveyed the envelope closely, and asked:

"What is that mark in the corner for, Mr. Hepburn?"

"Clear out, you rascal!" laughed the young man, slightly coloring. "It's a secret society sign. Now go!"

As the boy passed from the office, Weaver, the cashier, looked up and yawned: "Well, it's my lunch time," and a minute later he was hurrying after the leisurely Jimmy.

"I'm going past the post office, Jim," he remarked, as he overtook that youth; "give me Hepburn's letter and I'll drop it in for you."

Jimmy, glad of an opportunity to engage in an interesting game of marbles he saw being played round the corner, willingly gave up the letter, and Weaver passed down the street.

"Ah, that's the way the wind blows, is it?" he thought, glancing at the address. "'Miss Bertha Willey, 219 Madison Avenue.' I thought that that engagement was entirely broken off. This doesn't look like it; but I mean to know for certain."

Weaver had long been Hepburn's most persistent rival. The lady in the case was a prize well worth any man's earnest efforts to win, and when Frank Hepburn's engagement to her was announced, none of her admirers felt half the chagrin that seized Weaver. He had felt almost certain of winning her himself at one time, and, in the expectation of handling her snug fortune, had incurred certain debts which, according to the rude fashion of debts, were now "staring him in the face." Great, then, had been his satisfaction when a report reached him of the broken engagement, and he immediately called on Miss Willey. She received him cordially, and in the two succeeding weeks he frequently repeated the call.

"I will strike while the iron is hot," he said to himself, and, on this very evening, had determined to know his fate, when the sight of Hepburn's letter upset his plans.

"I will know what is in it," he thought, desperately. "I can open it—it's very carelessly sealed. Hepburn shall not come between us again if I can help it!"

He hurried home, and holding the envelope over a steaming kettle in his mother's kitchen, soon had its coveted contents in his hand. It ran thus:

"Bertha, Dear: I was wrong and you were right. Can I come and be forgiven? I have a fine business offer from a house in St. Paul; if I do not get a favorable reply from you to-morrow I shall accept it, and go immediately. Life without you is unendurable here. FRANK."

"You will get no answer to-morrow," Weaver muttered; "and once safe in the west, my coast is clear. What an idiot to intrust all his happiness to a letter! But, then, he's so terribly proud; he thought it would hurt his dignity less to write a note than seek an interview."

On the day after Weaver obtained this letter, he watched Hepburn narrowly, and saw he was restless and nervous, and by night that he was pale and weak. The next day he did not appear at the office, and word came that he was sick.

"Packing up for St. Paul," Weaver sneered to himself. "It's just an excuse."

But Frank Hepburn's was no assumed illness. "A bad case of brain fever," the doctor said, as he gazed with more than professional interest on the young man lying before him. His brown eyes were wide open, and restlessly flying from one face to another, as if in search of one that never came, while his parched tongue constantly formed the word "Bertha," gently and pleadingly spoken as long as his strength permitted him to utter it. Then, as he became weaker, only a half inarticulate murmur greeted the ears of the anxious watchers who bent above him.

"Who is Bertha?" the physician at last asked the weeping, gray-haired mother, who had come from a distant city to care for her only son. "We must find her. I have done all I can for his body, but only her coming can relieve his mind. And," he added, softly, "she must come soon."

At the office things went on as usual. Weaver noticed Frank's desk remained vacant, but he said to himself, when the clerks spoke of his illness:

"Men don't die of broken hearts, and he will recover, cured of his fancy."

He could not, however, bring himself to destroy the stolen letter, but, when alone, constantly took it from his pocket and glanced at it.

One day, while doing so, Mr. Wade suddenly entered the room. Hastily slipping it under a pile of bills, Weaver looked up.

"Mr. Weaver," his employer said, "let me come to your desk. I want to glance over Frank's papers. I am afraid the poor boy himself will never do that again. Sad, isn't it?" And Mr. Ward's kindly voice grew husky.

"Is it so bad as that, sir?" Weaver murmured, while a deathly faintness seized him.

"So bad as that, I fear," Mr. Wade answered, mechanically taking up a pile of papers and running over them. Suddenly he exclaimed:

"What's this?—a letter written by Frank himself and never sent?"

The pity that a moment ago had filled Weaver vanished, and a fierce desire to escape detection had taken its place.

"Why, yes," he said; "I remember Frank intended to invite Miss Willey to the opera for Thursday, but changed his mind, and, I suppose, did not send the letter. However, I am going down to inquire after him at noon, and if you will give me the letter, I'll leave it with his mother."

"Yes, yes," assented Mr. Wade; "that's a good idea."

Just then Jimmy entered. Catching sight of the letter in Mr. Wade's hand, he exclaimed:

"Why, Mr. Weaver, you didn't mail that letter that day."

Weaver turned pale.

"You don't know what you are talking about," he said, as Mr. Wade glanced up, inquiringly.

"Yes, I do," Jimmy persisted; "that's the letter Mr. Hepburn gave me to mail the day before he got sick. Don't you remember his saying that little cross was a secret sign?"

"Why didn't you mail it, Jimmy?" Mr. Wade interrupted, sternly.

"Why, sir, on my way to the office Mr. Weaver took it from me, and said he'd mail it himself."

Jimmy had taken the letter from Mr. Wade's hands, and, turning it over, exclaimed:

"It's opened now!"

"Mr. Weaver, I am sorry for this," Mr. Wade said, simply, and left the room.

His heart was very tender towards the poor boy he had seen that morning tossing restlessly from side to side, and still trying to murmur: "Bertha."

"The name is the same," he commented. "I'll take her the note and explain its delay. There may be a connection between this and his brain fever. God grant there is."

Hurriedly calling a cab, he drove to the address on the envelope, and was soon greeted by a young lady, who reponded to his inquiry for "Miss Bertha Willey."

"Is this your letter?" he asked, abruptly.

She looked at him rather haughtily an instant, then her whole air changed to one of intense eagerness as she caught sight of the address.

"Yes," she breathed, and in a moment had taken the note and devoured its contents.

"Where did you get it?" she asked, looking up, the pretty color that tinged her cheeks as she read dying out, and her little air of hauteur returning, though her eyes still danced, and there was a glad ring in her sweet voice.

Ignoring her question, Mr. Wade said, sharply:

"Do you know its writer is dying?"

"Dying! Frank!—oh, my darling!"

There was no need to ask if this was the Bertha. Only one woman can utter a man's name in that tone. The light and the color died out of her face in an instant, and a hard, strained look came in their place, more pitiful than any tears. She put her hand on her heart a moment, and then said, simply:

"Take me to him, please."

"Get your hat," Mr. Wade answered.

But she only looked at him again and whispered: "Take me to him."

Without a word more, he led her to the still waiting cab.

On reaching the house, Mr. Wade left her in the hall and hurried upstairs. A few, swift words explained to the doctor who was below, and he hastened down.

"You must be very quiet," he said, gently, though the charge seemed unnecessary in greeting the almost stony figure that awaited him. "Sleep must come within an hour, or death or hopeless insanity will result; but go to him, look and speak quietly and naturally, and if it is you he is dying for (a shudder ran through the girl), we may save him yet."

The doctor led the way to the sickroom, opened the door, and stood aside as she entered. Bertha swayed for an instant as she caught sight of the pitiful, wasted form extended before her; but love triumphed, and, swiftly advancing to the bedside, she bent above the wistful eyes and said, clearly and softly:

"Love, did you call me?"

"Bertha!" the pinched lips tried to say.

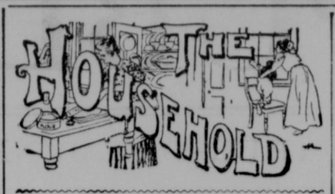
"Yes, Bertha," she cooed, softly laying her cool lips on his; "and now, darling, shut your eyes. I will put my cheek against yours and we will rest."

Like a tired child, he obeyed her, nestling his head on the cool, soft arm she slipped under it, while the peachy cheek that lay on his seemed to possess an almost magic power.

"He is saved!" the doctor murmured to the happy, bewildered mother; and so it proved, for Frank Hepburn awoke—very weak, indeed, but rational, "ready to drink a gallon of beef tea, and be married that very afternoon," he whispered, faintly.

When Mr. Wade returned to the office, he found Weaver had drawn his pay and left.

"He knew I wouldn't keep him an hour," Mr. Wade said, while relating the circumstance for the hundredth time at the Hepburn-Willey wedding two months later.



WHAT POLITENESS DID.

A Little Comedy of Errors in Which an Ill-Mannered Yellow Pup Played the Star Part.

Frequent meetings at the church guild, at the afternoon card club and a few calls constituted the acquaintanceship of Mrs. Becker and Mrs. Cassell. Nevertheless they were good enough chums.

They knew each other's troubles with servants, their favorite tailors, and, as both were dog lovers, had heard of each other's wonderful canine pets. As Mrs. Cassell swished up the front steps leading to Mrs. Becker's house the other afternoon a miserable, ugly, little yellow dog skipped up beside her and when the door was opened shot inside ahead of her. The animal was an irretrievably commonplace cur, and Mrs. Cassell was appalled.

"The very idea!" she said to herself, "of her boasting so over her dog. My terrier wouldn't condescend to look at him!"

She endeavored to conceal her horror of the little animal frisking around the reception room and to veil her pity when her hostess arrived. To Mrs. Cassell's amazement Mrs. Becker endured with equanimity the dog's careening across her satin upholstered chairs with frightfully wet and muddy feet, and beyond one quick look said never a word when he danced on a white sofa cushion embroidered in apple blossoms, but continued her conversation amiably.

Mrs Becker's housewifely soul was shocked. "Foolish as I may be over my Fido," she said to her inner consciousness, "I would not be so ridiculous as to smile while he ruined the furniture."

When the little dog, with his homely face, pranced across to Mrs. Becker and impudently planted those same feet in the lap of her delicate-hued house gown she did not repulse him, but with what Mrs. Cassell mentally decided was an idiotic smile, even patted his head and called him fond names. It was too much and Mrs. Cassell's opinion of her good friend dropped to zero with a thud. As she carried on a light conversation with her strangely benighted hostess she was assuring herself that charming manners, a love for good deeds and a pretty face did not make up for servile devotion to such a ragged rat of a dog as the one which at the moment was placidly chewing up the expensive lace curtains and tearing them with his paws. As the animal, unreproved, swallowed a whole renaissance lace flower he had abstracted from the body of the curtain her feelings overcame her, politeness or not.

THE CUR THAT FOLLOWED HER.

"Mrs. Becker," she said, "don't you think you ought to see to your dog? Look what he is doing."

Her hostess' face flushed, for dog lovers are touchy. "My dog?" she retorted, with the accent on the pronoun. "My dog, I'd have you know, behaves himself. I think if you'll restrain your own pet over there it might be as well."

Mrs. Cassell stared at the yellow cur. "My dog?" she repeated, dazedly. "That thing my dog?" And the indignation in her voice would have freighted a ship.

The two women were on their feet in bewilderment.

"He came in with you," persisted Mrs. Becker, "and of course I thought he was your dog you've talked about so much, and naturally I couldn't say a word while you sat there and let him spoil all my furniture and my clothes."

"I thought he was yours," broke in Mrs. Cassell, vehemently, "and have been perfectly horrified at the way you've let him go on the last 15 minutes."

As light broke in there was a concerted rush and a mischievous little yellow pup was ejected from the house with a haste which made up for former tolerance.

And then caller and hostess had a real sociable time over the gasoline bottle and two cleaning cloths instead of the conventional teapot.—Chicago Daily News.

Print Covers for Furniture.

Covers should always be provided for furniture, to be used when sweeping. Heavy print will last for years, or a fine, close cheesecloth makes good dusting sheets. If different colors are used for the different heavy pieces of furniture and the covers are made in varying size to fit the pictures and furniture much time will be saved. Calico bags for the ends of the curtains will also keep them from becoming soiled during the sweeping.

WOMEN IN POLITICS.

Mary A. Livermore, Lecturer and Author, Says Their Influence Is Great and Intelligent.

Women are organized to-day as never before in the history of the world. Their clubs, leagues, councils, circles, unions, chapters and associations for all kinds of purposes are in evidence by the thousands, and their memberships run up into the million. In these organizations lectures are delivered on all conceivable topics, and not alone on "art, literature and

(Author, Lecturer and Advocate of Woman's Rights.)

Browning," as the maligners of clubs would have us believe. Every social and public question under heaven is openly discussed in these societies by women appointed beforehand, and who have prepared themselves for the occasion, and reports of the debates are published in their official organs.

Inevitably, this enlarges the education of women and assists them in the formation of opinions concerning the mooted questions of the day in which men are interested. The average woman is as well educated as the average man, perhaps better, and is quite as well informed, and men know it. It is no uncommon thing to hear a man say nowadays: "My wife feels deeply about this Filipino war," or "this canteen question. I have not had time to read and think about it, as she has, but I'm inclined to believe she's right."

The "political influence" of women is felt strongly in towns and cities of Massachusetts when a local election is pending. Few of the 120 towns of the state that voted a no-license law last year could have done it without the help of women. They held no-license rallies, arranged for effective speaking and music, distributed literature, invoked the aid of the ministers and churches, canvassed for votes, and supplemented the men with whom they worked in every way possible. Thirty-three of the states of the union have local option laws in some form on their statute books, which means that on this one vital question alone women exert an enormous "political influence." Women have been the saddest sufferers from the liquor traffic from time immemorial, and they may be trusted to hit it hard when they have a chance.

Women took a deep interest in the election of Hon. Mr. Bates during the last gubernatorial campaign. They had no especial grievance against his competitor, but a mighty preference for Mr. Bates. The entire makeup of the man, his past record and the promise of the future given by his life and character constituted him the candidate who should be elected, in the estimation of not a few women of influence and activity. "Persuade the men of your household and acquaintance to vote for Bates" became their watchword. I must not tell tales out of school, but the methods that were quietly and persistently followed must have had their influence with voters.

"Has woman any influence in politics?" Ask Brigham Roberts, the Mormon polygamist, who would now be a member of the lower house of congress but for the women of the country, who threw their influence against him solidly, until he was sent back to Utah, and, like the lamented Hon. J. J. Ingalls, became "a statesman out of a job."

Does somebody rise to inquire: "Why women do not exert their political influence in behalf of school suffrage, which has been granted them in this state?" They do not have school suffrage, only school committee suffrage, which is another thing. They are not consulted in the nomination of the ticket for school committee, cannot attend the caucuses, and are only allowed to vote for a list of men of whom they know nothing, who are put in nomination by politicians of whom they know nothing. Before they can use this fragment of a right they are required to observe all the usages and forms which give men the full ballot. How many men could be dragooned to the polls under similar circumstances?—Mary A. Livermore, in Chicago Tribune.

When the Children Snore.

Snoring is a symptom that should not be neglected in children. It shows that there is some obstruction to the free passage of air from the nose to the throat. The tonsils may be enlarged, and partially close the passage at its lower opening. There may be polypus or some small tumor in the nasal passage itself, or catarrh of the throat or nose, or both. A physician should be consulted. — Ladies' Home Journal.

Ice in the Sick Room.

One way to keep ice in the sick room is to fasten a piece of flannel in a deep tin pan or pail so that it will sag in the middle, but will not touch the bottom of the pail. In this flannel a piece of ice can be put and so wrapped in its enveloping folds that no air can reach it. When small pieces need to be broken off a pin, preferably a hat pin, can be used.

HOW TO DO IT.

When I'm a grown-up woman,
Just like mamma, you know,
I'm going to have the daintiest things
When I have learned to sew,
I'll hemstitch and embroider,
And aesthetic patterns trace,
And I'll trim my frills with needlework
As delicate as lace.

When I'm a grown-up woman,
I'm going to learn to make
The most delicious puddings
And thirteen kinds of cake;
My bread shall be the lightest
And the whitest in the town,
And your mouth will water when you see
My coffee, golden brown.

When I'm a grown-up woman,
And have a house to keep,
I mustn't slight the corners
When I have learned to sweep;
The dusting and the cleaning
I must always do with care,
And a cobweb!—I should blush with shame
To find one anywhere.

But when mamma this morning
Was brushing out my curls,
She smiled, and said that women
Are grown-up little girls;
And to gain such skillful fingers,
The only certain way
Is to learn to work while I am young,
And practice every day.

COCOANUT HANDCUFFS.

Singular Methods Employed by South American Indians in Capturing Monkeys.

The Indian of South America employs this peculiar method of capturing monkeys:

Taking a cocoanut he cuts a hole in each end just large enough to enable a monkey to insert its paws; puts some lump sugar inside, then places it in a promising spot and awaits the capture of his game.

When a monkey finds the shell, in its greed it inserts a paw at each opening, closes them on the sugar and then cannot withdraw his paws without opening them again and dropping the sugar. Rather than do this the monkey will attempt to escape with the cocoanut on its paw and so is easily captured.—W. H. Worrell, in Chicago Chronicle.

THE MONKEY TRAP.

Nine Hours a Day's Work.

Maggie, a mare belonging to Aaron Yocum, a merchant of Reading, Pa., would make a good member for a labor union. Maggie is not a remarkable animal in any way—with one exception, she positively refuses to work more than nine hours a day. Maggie is now 33 years of age, and is only worked occasionally, but even in her old age she remembers the principle which governed her in early youth, and hangs on to the nine-hour schedule. When she is hitched up in the morning at seven o'clock she will work hard all morning. When noon comes, however, Maggie insists upon going to the stable. At one o'clock she is ready for the afternoon's work, but at five o'clock positively refuses to go anywhere but to the stable.

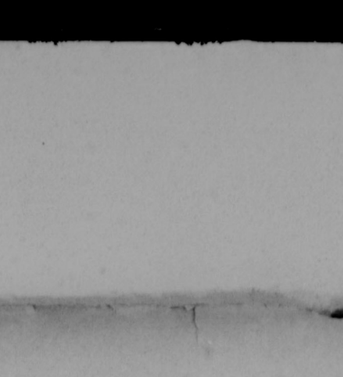
Where Islands Are Plentiful.

Between Madagascar and the coast of India there are about 16,000 islands, only 600 of which are inhabited.

GOVERNED BY INSTINCT.

When Collie Heard Sheep She Forgot Her Training and Almost Caused a Tragedy.

Even such intelligent animals as collie dogs will forget domestic training when instinct gets the upper hand. Monroe Hess, of 360 Indian Queen lane, Philadelphia, owns a handsome collie named Lady, who is the constant and watchful playmate of his two little boys. The children have a wagon and harness for Lady and spend hours daily carting dirt from one place to another. Last week they were busily engaged in this way when a cattle train slowly passed on the Reading road.



LADY AND HER MASTERS.

Two cars were loaded with sheep, some of which began to bleat. Lady pricked up her ears and at once started for the train, the children following in amazement, for their pet had never acted in this way before. Lady led them down the track. The boys did not notice the express train that is due at 4:20. The engineer whistled and put on his brakes.

Lady, with all her barking and excitement at the sight of the sheep, was the first to notice the express. She ran back across the track in front of the train. The boys took a short cut to head her off. The train caught the tail end of the cart and tumbled Lady and the fragment of the broken wagon into the ditch. The boys were off the track and the express whisked by, harming neither of them nor their playmate, but Mrs. Hess has her doubts about letting her little ones out of her sight in sole charge of even so faithful a friend as Lady generally proves herself to be.

WISDOM OF ANIMALS.

Monkey Is Considered the Most Intelligent and Sheep and Buffalo the Most Stupid.

The monkey is the most intelligent animal. Poodle dogs come next; then in order the Indian elephant, bear, lion, tiger, cat and otter. Ants, bees and spiders are more intelligent than horses and goats, and the wild rabbit has considerably more brain power than the camel. Tame rabbits come almost last in the list, and have less intelligence than the frog. The lowest form in the animal school is occupied by the nautilus, octopus, python, tame pigeon, deer, sheep, buffalo and bison.

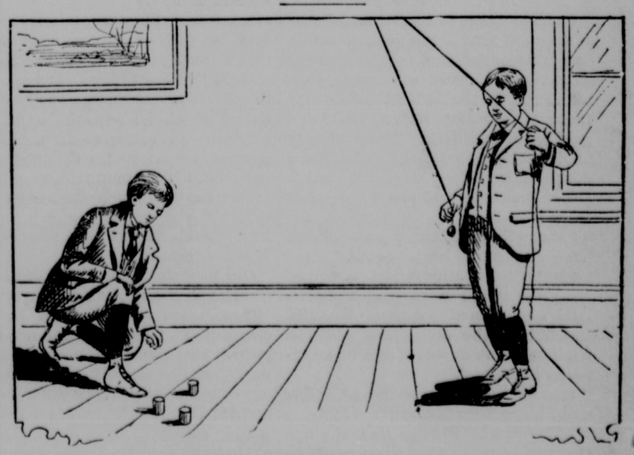
The spider, for instance, will construct its web in almost any position, and if it cannot find any natural object to which it can attach the supports it will construct little weights of mud, and place them at the lower parts of the web to keep it in position.

Bees will construct their honeycombs in any place regularly or irregularly shaped, and when they come to any corners and angles they seem to stop and consider. Then they will vary the shape of the cells, so that the space is exactly filled. It could not be done more satisfactorily if the whole thing had been worked out on paper beforehand. Ants will construct hard and smooth roads, and will drive tunnels compared to which man's efforts in the same line are insignificant.

New Description of a Circle.

A pupil in the juvenile department astonished his teacher recently by describing a circle as "a straight line that's crooked all the way round."

THE GAME OF THREE BITS.



Fasten a small metal weight at one end of a string, run the string so that it will move freely back and forth over a chandelier, or small brad driven into the ceiling.

Next saw from an old broom-handle three sections, each of two inches in length. These pieces are known as the bits. Let the weight hang straight to the floor. From the point it touches measure out three feet and on each side three inches. Inclose this space, three feet long, six inches wide, by pinning tapes to the floor.

Each player is allowed three swings, and he governs the length of the string to suit himself. The player not at the string may set up the three bits in any position he chooses; but they must be kept within the space marked out by the tapes.

To knock all three bits down in one swing counts ten, and allows an extra swing. To knock all three bits down in two swings counts five. To knock all three down in three swings counts three, or one for every bit knocked down. Forty is the highest count which can be made during one play of three swings, as only one extra turn is permitted. Ten plays of three swings each constitute a game. The player having the highest score, of course, wins.

There is a considerable opportunity for developing skill in knocking over the bits. Usually a player may calculate to sweep down two of the bits with his swing and his endeavor will be to glance from one of them into the third piece.

The best possible score is 400, but it will take months of practice before any player can even approach this score.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

THE FARMING WORLD

THE ASPARAGUS BEETLE.

To Exterminate This Pest for Next Year Active Operations Must Be Commenced Now.

The common asparagus beetle needs no description other than the illustration given herewith from a drawing by F. H. Chittenden, United States department of agriculture. It is not practical to spray old beds from which asparagus is being cut for the destruction of this pest. The beetles cluster upon the young shoots just as they are coming through the ground; even at times going below the surface, attacking the young plants. In old beds, several stalks should be permitted to stand in each row at intervals of about two rods. These stalks throw out leaves and the beetles concentrate upon them, feed for a short time, and then deposit their eggs. These trap plants can be sprayed thoroughly with paris green and water at the rate of four ounces in 40 gallons. The poison can be applied dry by mixing one pound of paris green in 100 pounds of common flour or land plaster.

The insects attacking young buds should be collected by hand at first. A couple of small boys with tin pails or pans containing about one pint of water and a teacupful of kerosene can catch the beetles by bending the young plants over the vessel and shaking them slightly, care being taken not to break them off. As soon as the plants begin to leaf out, they can be sprayed or dusted with paris green. If the young larvae or worms are brushed off on the dry, hot, sandy soil, during the middle of the day, many of them are destroyed.

The fight in combating this pest should begin now to save the crop both this and next year. As soon as the cutting season is over and before the old vines have become veritable breeding beds for the beetle, spray or dust thoroughly. The insects spend the winter as adults and hide any place they can find protection. If, therefore, the early and late broods are destroyed, the greatest number of them can be prevented from reaching maturity. If the first brood now depositing its eggs is fought persistently, the second generation will not be so difficult to handle. If both broods are allowed to breed without any attempt to destroy them, next year's asparagus crop will be in great danger.—Orange Judd Farmer.

RAIN AND SUNSHINE.

Scientists Claim They Are the Determining Factors in Flavoring Berries and Melons.

There are years when fruit has not the flavor usually belonging to it. Especially is this the case with strawberries and melons. On investigation it is found that rainfall and sunshine are the principal factors in determining flavors. In very wet seasons fruits grow large, but contain little sugar. In dry seasons much more sugar is elaborated, and this sugar enters very largely into the indefinable something we call flavor. Prof. Troop, of Indiana, touching on the same subject, says: "An excessive amount of rain is undoubtedly one of the chief causes of trouble. It is a well-known fact that during a very wet season strawberries are of much poorer quality, containing a less amout of sugar, than when the ripening season is comparatively dry. The same is true with muskmelons; the crop may be larger during a wet season, the fruit may be finer in appearance, but the sugar content which gives the melon its delicious flavor is comparatively low. Hence it frequently happens that a variety may give good satisfaction one season, and be very unsatisfactory the next. Thorough drainage, either naturally or artificially, will do much toward preventing trouble from this source. The use of fertilizers, rich in potash and phosphoric acid, will have a tendency to produce a fruit of high quality." It is doubtless true that selection of varieties for planting will do much to give flavor, even in a wet season.

The Fruit Bark Beetle.

A pest discussed at some length in a recent New York bulletin is the fruit bark beetle. This was especially prevalent last season and did much damage in peach orchards in western New York, and in some scattered plum and cherry plantations. On peaches its principal injury was due to punctures of the bark on the trunk and larger limbs, through which the sap oozed and formed gummy excrescences. On plum and cherry, however, more injury was done by punctures in the twigs, causing death of the foliage. The natural home of this insect is in dead bark, so all brush piles and dead trees should be removed from the orchards. Caustic washes upon trunks and branches serve as a preventive measure, and cutting off and burning the infested twigs destroys many of the beetles.

USE OF PETROLEUM.

Experience Shows That It Often Destroys Trees as Well as the Insects That Infest Them.

The varying and sometimes disastrous results obtained from the use of refined petroleum on growing trees as an insecticide, and especially against the San Jose scale, have led to the suspicion that the crude product might be less variable and drastic in its effects. But so far as it has been used it would appear that we have yet much to learn before we can with safety recommend the application of the crude product to the different varieties of fruit trees. That it is efficient in destroying the San Jose scale if it is brought in contact with this insect seems now quite probable. But the hundreds of dead trees that mark the areas where it has been indiscriminately used, point very clearly to the fact that great caution is necessary, and no one is, as yet, able to say just where safety ceases and danger begins. Then, too, when no permanent injury is apparent, as in the case of the seedling apples on the ground of the Ohio agricultural experiment station, who can say that this unnatural retardation may not after the first application prove to be a menace to the life or general vigor of the tree? It is well known that, in nature, these retardations sometimes occur, but nature seldom, if ever, covers the bark of a tree or shrub, and then only in part, with vegetable growths like lichens, and even these are known to be detrimental, a smooth, clean bark being always desirable. In the use of refined petroleum one of the most perplexing phenomenon observed was the fact that equally careful applications, made by the same person, with the same grade of oil, would give almost opposite results. Here recommendation of the refined product for general use has, in many cases, resulted disastrously and brought no little disrepute to the entomological fraternity of this country. The most that can now be said for the refined product is that a ten to twenty per cent. mixture with water constitutes a fairly successful summer wash and destroys the young scale, thereby checking the increase and spread until applications of whale oil soap mixtures can be made.—Prof. F. M. Webster, in Farmers' Review.

GOOD CALF MUZZLE.

A Very Simple and Inexpensive Contrivance Which Does Its Work Thoroughly.

A simple and a good calf muzzle is made by taking a scantling, a, 3 by 3 by 14 inches; bore an inch hole about 1½ inches from each end. Turn scantling over and bore two more holes two inches from each end. Take a small stick of about one inch or little larger and make a bow to go over the calf's neck. For the horns, b b, take two good seasoned pieces of wood about 14 inches long, make them round and sharp pointed at one end, and insert the other end in the holes bored in the scantling. Then place the muzzle on calf, take a string and tie over calf's nose, and you have a good muzzle complete.—C. P. Wood, in Farm and Home.

TIMELY DAIRY NOTES.

Milk at the same time every day. Milk thoroughly to the last drop, because the last milk is the best. Always keep the hands clean, and also the cow's udder and dairy utensils.

To milk young, restive cows, raise one of the fore feet. Never strike them.

Milk with four fingers, and not with index and thumb, a fault too common with milkers.

Let there be exact system in all movements about the dairy. Do not delay straining the milk until the cream has begun to rise again more slowly.

The farmer who makes the dairy his main business, rather than an adjunct, is the one who will turn out the best product, and procure the most profit and satisfaction.—Rural World.

A Point Worth Considering.

A close observer has well said that "birds have different tastes from men; as a rule they prefer bitter, sour or insipid fruit. We should never destroy such species as the wild cherry, wild grape, elder, blackbery, juneberry, mulberry, dogwood, Virginia creeper, buckthorn, sumach, bittersweet and others. By encouraging such plants we are approaching a solution of the problem, that will preserve for our own benefit both the cultivated fruit and the birds." This is a point that we think many people have overlooked. Where birds are most destructive is in localities where no food exists other than that growing in the farmer's garden.

Why Pulverization Pays.

The chief supply of drink to growing plants is moisture brought up from below by capillary action, and therein consists the necessity of pulverizing the soil thoroughly before planting, and continuous surface cultivation afterward. Weeds are sometimes counted as a blessing because their presence compels the farmer to continue really necessary cultivation, which he might otherwise feel justified in omitting to the detriment of the crop.—Midland Farmer.

SPORT IN WESTERN CANADA.

While the Farmer's Grain Is Ripening and His Stock Growing Fat, He May Have Plenty of Shooting.

There is probably no country on the American Continent where the life of the farmer carries with it that assurance of comfort and success as does Western Canada. Nor is there to be found anywhere else such a pleasant combination. Game abounds everywhere and nowhere does it afford such perfect amusement. A noted sportsman writing of the favorite pastime says: "There is one particular spot where I saw a man drop 70 mallards one morning, and bring them all to bag, too, for they dropped in open water or on flat prairie. At the right season of the year you can see black lines and triangles cut sharply out against the sky all round you, moving very swiftly, and you begin to wonder whether you have enough cartridges to hold out. You can hear the prairie-chicken crowing like barndoor fowls; and a little to the northeast is a bit of marshy ground, cattle poached, and dappled with gleaming pools, where the snipe are nearly as thick as mosquitoes. A thin column of blue smoke curling up in the distance shows you where a few wandering Indians have pitched their camp, but there is no other indication of civilization in sight. Still, the neighborhood is well-settled, and a short drive will bring you to a farmhouse where you can buy the finest butter and the freshest eggs for uncivilized prices.

"A very short railway journey will bring you to a country full of deer and the lordly wapiti, the king of the deer tribe the world over; and down on the flat, boggy land by the lake shores the moose will stand knee-deep in water on the summer evenings, ready to lie down when the flies get bothering. All day you breathe the wild free air of the prairie, and at night you are lulled to sleep by the surge and ripple and splash of the waves on the beach, broken now and then by the weird banshee-cry of strange water-fowl." Particulars regarding settlement of the lands of Western Canada can be had from any agent of the Canadian Government, whose advertisement appears elsewhere in your columns.

A REMARKABLE RECOVERY.

Young Man's Back, Broken at a Dance, Operated On Successfully by a Surgeon.

While dancing at Glendale, L. I., last August Joseph Lennon fell from the platform and injured his back. He was sent to the hospital at Jamaica, where three vertebrae of his spinal column were operated on. Lennon rallied after the operation, but while he could read and talk he had no control over either his arms or legs. Before Dr. Herbert K. Noble performed the operation he performed a similar one on a dead body. It took him four hours to remove the broken portions of bone from Lennon's spine.

A few weeks after the operation Lennon was able to sit up in bed, and in February he was able to move his toes a little. Gradually he has recovered the use of all his limbs, and about the middle of March he was able to stand up. Gradually he gained until he could stand alone, and last Monday he took four steps alone. Since then he has walked the entire length of the ward alone.

WHEN THE DEAD AWAKE.

Some Strange Instances in Which Corpses Have Seemed to Feign Life.

Live persons have feigned death with marvelous exactness, but when the dead feign life, or seem to feign life, the spectacle is as grewsome as can well be imagined.

Not long ago a Russian cemetery was the scene of as weird a wedding as ever has been witnessed, says a London paper. A young girl who had been betrothed died on the eve of her marriage, and her friends decided that, in spite of the intervening hand of death, the marriage ceremony should be carried on, and the ceremony was performed at the side of the grave, and after the marriage the body was returned to the coffin and lowered to its long resting place.

It is less than a year ago that a valuable cup was won in a bicycle race in Australia by a man who was dead when he passed the winning post. The race took place at an "electric light carnival," so called, in the presence of 10,000 spectators. In the last lap James Somerville, a rider, forged to the front and secured such a lead that his victory was assured. When within 25 yards of the finish he was seen to relax his hold on the handle bar and to relax his hold on the pedals. He did not fall from the machine, however, and amid frantic cheers dashed by the goal, winning the race by half a wheel. As he passed the finishing post he pitched forward and fell to the ground. When he was picked up he was found to be dead, and, what was more, the doctors declared that death had come to him when he was seen to lose his hold on the handle bars. It was a dead body that had ridden the last 25 yards of the race.

On a recent voyage the sealing schooner Arietis was cruising about 200 miles off the coast of British Columbia, when she sighted a dismantled ship. The Arietis bore down upon the derelict, and as she got near enough a man was seen on board grasping the wheel and apparently steering the craft. No other sign of man was seen on the ship. The man at the wheel was hailed, but returned no answer—just stood there grasping the spokes of the wheel and looking straight ahead. A boat was lowered and the mysterious ship boarded. When they came close to the man at the wheel they saw with horror that he was dead and had evidently been dead for many days. The ship, which was named the General Siglin, had sailed from San Francisco for Alaska. She had clearly been dismantled in a gale and then abandoned by her crew. The captain had refused to leave the ship, and, finding his strength failing, he had lashed himself to the wheel and literally died at his post, steering the craft for hundreds of miles with hands that held the wheel in as firm a grip as when alive.

Fodder Tree from the Adriatic.

From the island of Lissa, in the Adriatic, agents of the agricultural department sent cuttings of St. John's bread, which is a leguminous tree, suited for rather dry, calcareous soils in the southern states, Porto Rico and Hawaii. It is a fodder tree, yielding immense quantities of pods, which are shipped and sold for cattle feed and which are also used by brewers and distillers. The tree commences to bear when it is 15 years old and yields from 450 to 650 pounds of pod per tree. On the island of Lissa the bearing tree yields pods to the value of from $5.50 to $8.50 per annum.—N. Y. Sun.

How Mothers may Help their Daughters into Womanhood

Every mother possesses information of vital value to her young daughter. That daughter is a precious legacy, and the responsibility for her future is largely in the hands of the mother. The mysterious change that develops the thoughtless girl into the thoughtful woman should find the mother on the watch day and night. As she cares for the physical well-being of her daughter, so will the woman be, and her children also.

When the young girl's thoughts become sluggish, when she experiences headaches, dizziness, faintness, and exhibits an abnormal disposition to sleep, pains in the back and lower limbs, eyes dim, desire for solitude, and a dislike for the society of other girls, when she is a mystery to herself and friends, then the mother should go to her aid promptly. At such a time the greatest aid to nature is Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It prepares the young system for the coming change, and is the surest reliance in this hour of trial.

The following letters from Miss Good are practical proof of Mrs. Pinkham's efficient advice to young women.

Miss Good asks Mrs. Pinkham for Help.

June 12th, 1899.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I have been very much bothered for some time with my monthly periods being irregular. I will tell you all about it, and put myself in your care, for I have heard so much of you. Each month menstruation would become less and less, until it entirely stopped for six months, and now it has stopped again. I have become very nervous and of a very bad color. I am a young girl and have always had to work very hard. I would be very much pleased if you would tell me what to do."—MISS PEARL GOOD, Cor. 29th Avenue and Yeslar Way, Seattle, Wash.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I cannot praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound enough. It is just simply wonderful the change your medicine has made in me. I feel like another person. My work is now a pleasure to me, while before using your medicine it was a burden. To-day I am a healthy and happy girl. I think if more women would use your Vegetable Compound there would be less suffering in the world. I cannot express the relief I have experienced by using Lydia E. Worms CASCARETS are a sure cure for tape worms and those other pests of worms that make the lives of children and their mothers miserable. Any variety of parasites that live in the human stomach or bowels, and feed on the substance which should properly nourish the body, are dislodged by Cascarets Candy Cathartic, and expelled. One or two tablets usually drive them out, and persistent use is sure to do away with the unwelcome intruders. Many children and older people suffer from worms without knowing it, and get thin and weak, although their appetite is good. The best way to find out is to take Cascarets. Never accept a substitute!

THE FARMING WORLD

THE ASPARAGUS BEETLE.

To Exterminate This Pest for Next Year Active Operations Must Be Commenced Now.

The common asparagus beetle needs no description other than the illustration given herewith from a drawing by F. H. Chittenden, United States department of agriculture. It is not practical to spray old beds from which asparagus is being cut for the destruction of this pest. The beetles cluster upon the young shoots just as they are coming through the ground; even at times going below the surface, attacking the young plants. In old beds, several stalks should be permitted to stand in each row at intervals of about two rods. These stalks throw out leaves and the beetles concentrate upon them, feed for a short time, and then deposit their eggs. These trap plants can be sprayed thoroughly with paris green and water at the rate of four ounces in 40 gallons. The poison can be applied dry by mixing one pound of paris green in 100 pounds of common flour or land plaster.

ASPARAGUS BEETLE IN VARIOUS STAGES.

The insects attacking young buds should be collected by hand at first. A couple of small boys with tin pails or pans containing about one pint of water and a teacupful of kerosene can catch the beetles by bending the young plants over the vessel and shaking them slightly, care being taken not to break them off. As soon as the plants begin to leaf out, they can be sprayed or dusted with paris green. If the young larvae or worms are brushed off on the dry, hot, sandy soil, during the middle of the day, many of them are destroyed.

The fight in combating this pest should begin now to save the crop both this and next year. As soon as the cutting season is over and before the old vines have become veritable breeding beds for the beetle, spray or dust thoroughly. The insects spend the winter as adults and hide any place they can find protection. If, therefore, the early and late broods are destroyed, the greatest number of them can be prevented from reaching maturity. If the first brood now depositing its eggs is fought persistently, the second generation will not be so difficult to handle. If both broods are allowed to breed without any attempt to destroy them, next year's asparagus crop will be in great danger.—Orange Judd Farmer.

RAIN AND SUNSHINE.

Scientists Claim They Are the Determining Factors in Flavoring Berries and Melons.

There are years when fruit has not the flavor usually belonging to it. Especially is this the case with strawberries and melons. On investigation it is found that rainfall and sunshine are the principal factors in determining flavors. In very wet seasons fruits grow large, but contain little sugar. In dry seasons much more sugar is elaborated, and this sugar enters very largely into the indefinable something we call flavor. Prof. Troop, of Indiana, touching on the same subject, says: "An excessive amount of rain is undoubtedly one of the chief causes of trouble. It is a well-known fact that during a very wet season strawberries are of much poorer quality, containing a less amout of sugar, than when the ripening season is comparatively dry. The same is true with muskmelons; the crop may be larger during a wet season, the fruit may be finer in appearance, but the sugar content which gives the melon its delicious flavor is comparatively low. Hence it frequently happens that a variety may give good satisfaction one season, and be very unsatisfactory the next. Thorough drainage, either naturally or artificially, will do much toward preventing trouble from this source. The use of fertilizers, rich in potash and phosphoric acid, will have a tendency to produce a fruit of high quality." It is doubtless true that selection of varieties for planting will do much to give flavor, even in a wet season.

The Fruit Bark Beetle.

A pest discussed at some length in a recent New York bulletin is the fruit bark beetle. This was especially prevalent last season and did much damage in peach orchards in western New York, and in some scattered plum and cherry plantations. On peaches its principal injury was due to punctures of the bark on the trunk and larger limbs, through which the sap oozed and formed gummy excrescences. On plum and cherry, however, more injury was done by punctures in the twigs, causing death of the foliage. The natural home of this insect is in dead bark, so all brush piles and dead trees should be removed from the orchards. Caustic washes upon trunks and branches serve as a preventive measure, and cutting off and burning the infested twigs destroys many of the beetles.

USE OF PETROLEUM.

Experience Shows That It Often Destroys Trees as Well as the Insects That Infest Them.

The varying and sometimes disastrous results obtained from the use of refined petroleum on growing trees as an insecticide, and especially against the San Jose scale, have led to the suspicion that the crude product might be less variable and drastic in its effects. But so far as it has been used it would appear that we have yet much to learn before we can with safety recommend the application of the crude product to the different varieties of fruit trees. That it is efficient in destroying the San Jose scale if it is brought in contact with this insect seems now quite probable. But the hundreds of dead trees that mark the areas where it has been indiscriminately used, point very clearly to the fact that great caution is necessary, and no one is, as yet, able to say just where safety ceases and danger begins. Then, too, when no permanent injury is apparent, as in the case of the seedling apples on the ground of the Ohio agricultural experiment station, who can say that this unnatural retardation may not after the first application prove to be a menace to the life or general vigor of the tree? It is well known that, in nature, these retardations sometimes occur, but nature seldom, if ever, covers the bark of a tree or shrub, and then only in part, with vegetable growths like lichens, and even these are known to be detrimental, a smooth, clean bark being always desirable. In the use of refined petroleum one of the most perplexing phenomenon observed was the fact that equally careful applications, made by the same person, with the same grade of oil, would give almost opposite results. Here recommendation of the refined product for general use has, in many cases, resulted disastrously and brought no little disrepute to the entomological fraternity of this country. The most that can now be said for the refined product is that a ten to twenty per cent. mixture with water constitutes a fairly successful summer wash and destroys the young scale, thereby checking the increase and spread until applications of whale oil soap mixtures can be made.—Prof. F. M. Webster, in Farmers' Review.

GOOD CALF MUZZLE.

A Very Simple and Inexpensive Contrivance Which Does Its Work Thoroughly.

A simple and a good calf muzzle is made by taking a scantling, a, 3 by 3 by 14 inches; bore an inch hole about 1½ inches from each end. Turn scantling over and bore two more holes two inches from each end. Take a small stick of about one inch or little larger and make a bow to go over the calf's neck. For the horns, b b, take two good seasoned pieces of wood about 14 inches long, make them round and sharp pointed at one end, and insert the other end in the holes bored in the scantling. Then place the muzzle on calf, take a string and tie over calf's nose, and you have a good muzzle complete.—C. P. Wood, in Farm and Home.

TIMELY DAIRY NOTES.

Milk at the same time every day. Milk thoroughly to the last drop, because the last milk is the best. Always keep the hands clean, and also the cow's udder and dairy utensils.

To milk young, restive cows, raise one of the fore feet. Never strike them.

Milk with four fingers, and not with index and thumb, a fault too common with milkers.

Let there be exact system in all movements about the dairy. Do not delay straining the milk until the cream has begun to rise again more slowly.

The farmer who makes the dairy his main business, rather than an adjunct, is the one who will turn out the best product, and procure the most profit and satisfaction.—Rural World.

A Point Worth Considering.

A close observer has well said that "birds have different tastes from men; as a rule they prefer bitter, sour or insipid fruit. We should never destroy such species as the wild cherry, wild grape, elder, blackbery, juneberry, mulberry, dogwood, Virginia creeper, buckthorn, sumach, bittersweet and others. By encouraging such plants we are approaching a solution of the problem, that will preserve for our own benefit both the cultivated fruit and the birds." This is a point that we think many people have overlooked. Where birds are most destructive is in localities where no food exists other than that growing in the farmer's garden.

Why Pulverization Pays.

The chief supply of drink to growing plants is moisture brought up from below by capillary action, and therein consists the necessity of pulverizing the soil thoroughly before planting, and continuous surface cultivation afterward. Weeds are sometimes counted as a blessing because their presence compels the farmer to continue really necessary cultivation, which he might otherwise feel justified in omitting to the detriment of the crop.—Midland Farmer.

SPORT IN WESTERN CANADA.

While the Farmer's Grain Is Ripening and His Stock Growing Fat, He May Have Plenty of Shooting.

There is probably no country on the American Continent where the life of the farmer carries with it that assurance of comfort and success as does Western Canada. Nor is there to be found anywhere else such a pleasant combination. Game abounds everywhere and nowhere does it afford such perfect amusement. A noted sportsman writing of the favorite pastime says: "There is one particular spot where I saw a man drop 70 mallards one morning, and bring them all to bag, too, for they dropped in open water or on flat prairie. At the right season of the year you can see black lines and triangles cut sharply out against the sky all round you, moving very swiftly, and you begin to wonder whether you have enough cartridges to hold out. You can hear the prairie-chicken crowing like barndoor fowls; and a little to the northeast is a bit of marshy ground, cattle poached, and dappled with gleaming pools, where the snipe are nearly as thick as mosquitoes. A thin column of blue smoke curling up in the distance shows you where a few wandering Indians have pitched their camp, but there is no other indication of civilization in sight. Still, the neighborhood is well-settled, and a short drive will bring you to a farmhouse where you can buy the finest butter and the freshest eggs for uncivilized prices.

"A very short railway journey will bring you to a country full of deer and the lordly wapiti, the king of the deer tribe the world over; and down on the flat, boggy land by the lake shores the moose will stand knee-deep in water on the summer evenings, ready to lie down when the flies get bothering. All day you breathe the wild free air of the prairie, and at night you are lulled to sleep by the surge and ripple and splash of the waves on the beach, broken now and then by the weird banshee-cry of strange water-fowl." Particulars regarding settlement of the lands of Western Canada can be had from any agent of the Canadian Government, whose advertisement appears elsewhere in your columns.

A REMARKABLE RECOVERY.

Young Man's Back, Broken at a Dance, Operated On Successfully by a Surgeon.

While dancing at Glendale, L. I., last August Joseph Lennon fell from the platform and injured his back. He was sent to the hospital at Jamaica, where three vertrbrae of his spinal column were operated on. Lennon rallied after the operation, but while he could read and talk he had no control over either his arms or legs. Before Dr. Herbert K. Noble performed the operation he performed a similar one on a dead body. It took him four hours to remove the broken portions of bone from Lennon's spine.

A few weeks after the operation Lennon was able to sit up in bed, and in February he was able to move his toes a little. Gradually he has recovered the use of all his limbs, and about the middle of March he was able to stand up. Gradually he gained until he could stand alone, and last Monday he took four steps alone. Since then he has walked the entire length of the ward alone.

WHEN THE DEAD AWAKE.

Some Strange Instances in Which Corpses Have Seemed to Feign Life.

Live persons have feigned death with marvelous exactness, but when the dead feign life, or seem to feign life, the spectacle is as grewsome as can well be imagined.

Not long ago a Russian cemetery was the scene of as weird a wedding as ever has been witnessed, says a London paper. A young girl who had been betrothed died on the eve of her marriage, and her friends decided that, in spite of the intervening hand of death, the marriage ceremony should be carried on, and the ceremony was performed at the side of the grave, and after the marriage the body was returned to the coffin and lowered to its long resting place.

It is less than a year ago that a valuable cup was won in a bicycle race in Australia by a man who was dead when he passed the winning post. The race took place at an "electric light carnival," so called, in the presence of 10,000 spectators. In the last lap James Somerville, a rider, forged to the front and secured such a lead that his victory was assured. When within 25 yards of the finish he was seen to relax his hold on the handle bar and to relax his hold on the pedals. He did not fall from the machine, however, and amid frantic cheers dashed by the goal, winning the race by half a wheel. As he passed the finishing post he pitched forward and fell to the ground. When he was picked up he was found to be dead, and, what was more, the doctors declared that death had come to him when he was seen to lose his hold on the handle bars. It was a dead body that had ridden the last 25 yards of the race.

On a recent voyage the sealing schooner Arietis was cruising about 200 miles off the coast of British Columbia, when she sighted a dismantled ship. The Arietis bore down upon the derelict, and as she got near enough a man was seen on board grasping the wheel and apparently steering the craft. No other sign of man was seen on the ship. The man at the wheel was hailed, but returned no answer—just stood there grasping the spokes of the wheel and looking straight ahead. A boat was lowered and the mysterious ship boarded. When they came close to the man at the wheel they saw with horror that he was dead and had evidently been dead for many days. The ship, which was named the General Siglin, had sailed from San Francisco for Alaska. She had clearly been dismantled in a gale and then abandoned by her crew. The captain had refused to leave the ship, and, finding his strength failing, he had lashed himself to the wheel and literally died at his post, steering the craft for hundreds of miles with hands that held the wheel in as firm a grip as when alive.

Fodder Tree from the Adriatic.

From the island of Lissa, in the Adriatic, agents of the agricultural department sent cuttings of St. John's bread, which is a leguminous tree, suited for rather dry, calcareous soils in the southern states, Porto Rico and Hawaii. It is a fodder tree, yielding immense quantities of pods, which are shipped and sold for cattle feed and which are also used by brewers and distillers. The tree commences to bear when it is 15 years old and yields from 450 to 650 pounds of pod per tree. On the island of Lissa the bearing tree yields pods to the value of from $5.50 to $8.50 per annum.—N. Y. Sun.

Notice is hereby given to the Republican Voters of Garrett county to assemble in primary meetings in their respective election districts on SATURDAY, JUNE 29th, 1901,

at the hour of two o'clock p. m. for the purpose of electing five delegates from each election district of Garrett county to attend a County Convention to be held in the town of Oakland on

TUESDAY, JULY 2nd, 1901,

at twelve o'clock noon, for the purpose of nominating—

One candidate for State Senator.
Two candidates for Members of the House of Delegates.
One candidate for Sheriff.
One candidate for County Treasurer.
Two candidates for County Commissioners.
One candidate for Register of Wills.
One candidate for County Surveyor.

And also to elect three delegates to attend a State Convention of the Republican party to be held in Baltimore City on TUESDAY, AUGUST 6th, 1901, for the purpose of nominating—

One candidate for Clerk of the Court of Appeals of Maryland.
One candidate for Comptroller of the Treasury of Maryland.

At said primary meetings each district will also elect a district committee consisting of five members.

At the County Convention a new State Central Committee for Garrett county, consisting of three members, will be elected.

In District No. 11 the primaries will be held at the residence of Jacob Strickland. In District No. 6 the primaries will be held at Sang Run. In the other districts of the county the places of meeting will be at the usual places of holding said primary elections.

By order of the Republican State Central Committee of Garrett county, Maryland.

GEORGE D. WHITE,
Chairman.

Newspaper Frauds.

"Non-partisan" papers, edited by partisans, are the most patent humbugs of the age. In commenting upon public matters they start out non-partisan, but wind up partisan. They are simply frauds. A partisan paper is the more to be admired. It sacrafices patronage for principle. It is more honest, for it does not play for both sides, and does not pretend to be anything than partisan. There is nothing antagonistic to honesty in being partisan, and there is every inducement to dishonesty in being non-partisan or independent. The most despicable object is a partisan who pretends to conduct a non-partisan or independent paper, and then by his acts endorses every principle and policy which his party espouses.—Westminster (Md.) Advocate.

Are the Republicans of Garrett County Free Politically?

Ever since Allegany county was divided and Garrett county formed the above question has been more or less discussed by the Republicans of the new county. At times the issue dies out only to be rekindled by each succeeding campaign of importance. This year the subject is being discussed with more energy than heretofore owing to the attitude of certain parties in the two counties who seem to be impressed with the idea that Garrett county Republicans are unable or at least have not the faculty of choosing for themselves the candidates to be elected by their votes.

Within the past two months conferences have been held at different points in this and Allegany counties between would-be leaders of the Republican party whereby the entire ticket to be nominated by the Republicans of this county has been slated. Every person to appear upon the ticket has been named and his place designated. And for what? Simply to boost one man for a responsible position for which he is in no wise fitted. A part of the scheme is to elect a United States Senator from Maryland, the votes of Garrett county's delegates to Annapolis having been pledged to him in advance of either the nomination or election, provided the machinations of the schemers do not miscarry. The names of the principals of this plot are known wherever the matter has been talked of and can be given if necessary. To make their ground more secure agents have been sent to different sections of the county for the purpose of effecting combinations with candidates for office whereby their votes in the convention will be thrown to the candidate chosen for the people of Garrett county by the Allegany county politicians. In nearly every district one can see the hand of the Allegany county crowd. Here is a candidate for the House of Delegates, put up expressly for the benefit of the Allegany county people and not to serve the interests of those who elect him. There is another for the same position and the same motive. Here a candidate for State Senator, named by the Allegany county people and expected to be elected by the votes of free born, liberty loving, intelligent Garrett county citizens.

The facts recited above are absolutely true and can be proven. More could be said upon the same subject if necessary.

Is it not time the Republicans of Garrett county were bestiring themselves? If things are allowed to drift we may in a few years from hence ask in vain—

"Are the Republicans of Garrett county free Politically?"

Relation of Pulpit and Press.

In discussing the church from a standpoint of business and the relations which should exist between the pulpit and press, the Rev. Dwight E. Marvin, D. D., recently discoursed at Asbury Park in the following vein:

"There should be honor in churches. The church is no charitable institution, begging for worldly patronage, asking for support and giving nothing in return. It is God's earthly business center, where he bestows upon men the greatest gifts. Some churches make themselves repulsive to straight forward, clear headed business men because of their methods that are small and degrading. If a church society gives an entertainment and sells tickets, an equivalent for that which is charged, it acts in a business-like way and does nothing that it need be ashamed of. But when it forces tickets on business men on the pain of losing trade, it simply goes into the blackmailing business and deserves to receive the condemnation of the community. Any church has the right to expect the support of the daily press.

"The newspaper is the church's hand-maid to assist in advancing the divine kingdom, but it has no right to ask for all kinds of complimentary notices and reviews of insignificant meetings and entertainments as puffs. This, too, is degrading. I have come in business contact with a large number of publishers in my life and I have found them business-like, courteous and willing to act generously toward the churches, but I have found few churches that have shown themselves willing to advertise to any great extent or speak good words for the daily paper.

"It should be thoroughly understood that a publisher of a daily paper is under no obligation to advertise the church without pay or spread its fame and receive therefore only criticism. As a vender of news and an educator of the people he is under obligation to tell the news, speak the truth and teach morality, but that does not put him under bonds to print paragraphs lauding the minor activities of the church."

Good Roads.

We gladly note the fact that all over this country there is a growing practical interest in the improvement of our roads. One community represented in the convention in Philadelphia the other day, was enabled to set forth the fact that recently, in one single county, ninety miles of macadamized roads had been constructed and that land had advanced 50 per cent in value since their completion.

Winchester, Va., with but few factories and little else than her good schools to develop her growth and thrift, with her network of splendid turnpikes radiating like spokes from the hub of a wheel, is in striking evidence of the value of good roads. So are Staunton, Va., and Frederick City, Maryland.

What are we to do about this? Surely we do not propose to stand still and stagnant. If so, our children will reproach us when we are gone.

Railroads are of immense value and yet, good, well kept Turnpikes, radiating from this center, would be of incalculable advantage. Bankers, merchants and others, why shall we not have them?

Joy at the White House.

The announcement made yesterday by one of Mrs. McKinley's physicians that the distinguished patient is now out of danger, and is convalescing, not only caused joy at the White House, but will be read with sincere gratification in all parts of the land. Few ever believed that such news would come from her bedroom, as when she returned from the West her condition was such as to warrant the fear that she could live but a few days at the most. Her case was desperate, indeed, but the best medical skill, aided by her own remarkable power of recovery, have triumphed, at least for the time being, and her physicians are convinced that she will soon be as well as before the attack. The present plans include a removal to Canton in a fortnight, and possibly a stay at some quiet resort during a portion of the heated term.

It is now over a month since Mrs. McKinley was taken alarmingly ill in California, and during all that time the President has been the most faithful watcher at her bedside, readily sacrificing his own comfort in the hope that he might be of some aid to his stricken wife. His devotion to her has never failed or relaxed all through her illness, but the strain has now relaxed, and he will not only have time for a much needed rest, but for more attention to business, which he has been forced to neglect. No wonder, then, there is joy in the White House over the good news given out by the doctors yesterday.

The Troubles of Gorman.

Arthur Pue Gorman, head of the regular hidebound Democratic organization in Maryland, is in a dilemma. He is afraid to declare himself a candidate for United States Senator because he is not sure of winning. The growing opposition to him in his own party in some parts of the State, the fact that the disfranchising election law does not bar as many colored persons from voting as was at first expected and other reasons, seem to make Gorman hesitate.

Some of the Democratic party leaders say that he will come out for the Senatorship at the proper time, and that there is no doubt that he will be the unanimous choice of the party. Other Democrats declare that the party cannot secure control of the Legislature or carry the State ticket with Gorman against the issue. It is said he will define his position within the next few days.

The Splendid work of Senator McComas, Chairman Goldsborough and several of the Republican city leaders in effecting a reconciliation between the Republican factions in Baltimore at the recent meeting of the Republican State Committee assures a united front in the campaign against Gorman. It is the belief of the Republican leaders and prominent anti-Gorman Democrats that Gorman will fight to the bitter end. This is what Republican party leaders expect and nothing is more pleasing than to have Gorman in the front of the fight.

Democratic party affairs are apparently at sixes and sevens just now. With former Governor Brown trumpeting in clarion tones his warning that Democratic success this fall is dependent upon the standing aside of the "graybeards," the substitution of younger leaders and the subordination of personal ambition to party success, with Mayor Hayes and the city administration sore, dissatisfied and determined to hold aloof from the machine; with J. Frank Morrison and his Crescent Club adopting resolutions denouncing the organization make-up and preparing to fight for a change, and with the Bryan Democrats, led by S. S. Field, outspoken in their denunciation of the State leaders, the Democratic skies are, indeed, beclouded. To make the situation more depressing for Gorman, the friends of Governor Smith are industriously circulating his name as that of the proper party candidate for the Senate. An officeholder appointed by the Governor announces that the latter would unquestionably be a stronger candidate than Gorman. This is very well as far as it goes, but to those who understand the situation, the name Governor Smith, no matter in what connection used, will not improve the situation. His unwarranted and offensive call of an extra session of the Legislature to disfranchise illiterate voters renders him utterly unavailable for further political prominence before the people of Maryland.

Third Term Talk Squelched.

If anybody was beginning to get nervous over third term talk, their fears must be quieted by the explicit and unequivocal statement of President McKinley that under no circumstances would he be a candidate for a third term nor accept a nomination if tendered to him. All sincere people will accept this declaration as final. President McKinley does well thus to put an end once for all to third term gossip.

It is an unwritten law of the land that no man shall go beyond where Washington and Jefferson stopped, and no one respects this sentiment more unalterably than does William McKinley. The grave questions which his administration is called upon to settle can be considered on their merits, uninfluenced by any suspicion of a desire to succeed himself in office. President McKinley has had all the honor there is in the Presidency, and more than the usual share of its labors and vexatious duties, and he will be glad at the end of eight years of most honorable service and high usefulness to his country to retire to the rest and comforts of private life.

Especially unkind has been this talk of a third term just at a time when the President's devoted wife is hovering between life and death and his thoughts are upon her rather than upon how to continue himself in an office whose claims render the enjoyment of domestic life almost impossible.

All who may have thought it possible for President McKinley to harbor third term aspirations should read and reread these words of the statement which he issues over his own signature:

"In view, therefore, of the reiteration of the suggestion of it, I will say now, once for all, expressing a long settled conviction, that I not only am not and will not be a candidate for a third term, but would not accept a nomination for it if it were tendered me. My only ambition is to serve through my second term to the acceptance of my countrymen, whose generous confidence I so deeply appreciate, and then with them to do my duty in the ranks of private citizenship."

Circuit Court Proceedings.

Monday morning last the adjourned March term of the Circuit Court convened here with Chief Judge Boyd presiding.

After preliminary work on the part of the attorneys in a number of cases and the arraignment of two witnesses who were secretly conveyed from town at the regular term so as to prevent them from appearing in a criminal proceeding and for which offence Judge Boyd fined each $1 and costs, two or three appeal cases from the Justices' dockets were taken up and determined.

The ejectment suit of W. C. Merriam vs. the Cumberland Paper Company, in which Mr. Hamill appears for the plaintiff and E. H. Sincell and Lloyd Lowndes for the defendant, was taken up on Monday afternoon and is still occupying the attention of the court. The evidence was all presented yesterday and this morning the arguments will be made.

The jury was discharged from further service on Monday morning as all cases coming up at this term will be tried before the court.

Death of a Colored Boy.

Walter, aged about 15 years, son of Oscar Notes, colored, who removed with his family from Oakland to Piedmont some years ago, died in the latter place Thursday of diphtheria. The boy was quite a manly lad and well liked by all who knew him. His death is keenly felt by his family.

Chautauqua Program.

The program for the 19th annual session of the Mountain Chautauqua has been printed and is being mailed to all parts of the ceuntry. This office has been supplied with an advanced copy but coming so late no extended notice of the program can be given at present. A glance through it, however, discloses the fact that this season Mountain Lake Park will have in many ways richer treats for its patrons than in former years. Nearly all the old-time favorites, including Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage, Jahu DeWitt Miller and others are to be there. Among the new faces who will be seen will be Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, the distinguished Southerner, who has won such fame in recent years as the Goveror General of Cuba; Lieut. (now Captain) Hobson, of Merrimac fame; Rev. Father Francis C. Kelley, a broad minded and eloquent Catholic priest; Congressman Dolliver and others of more or less National fame.

A visit to the Park this summer will be well worth your while.

TAX SALE —OF— Real Estate

Under and by virtue of the power vested in the Treasurer of Garrett county, Maryland, by Section 51, Chapter 566, of Acts of the General Assembly of Maryland for the year 1890, title "Garrett County," sub-title "County Treasurer," and also by Section 52, Chapter 566, as amended by the General Assembly of Maryland for the year 1898, the undersigned, as late Treasurer in and for Garrett county, Maryland, will on SATURDAY, July 6, 1901,

at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. at the front door of the Court House in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, offer and sell at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, all of the following pieces or parcels of land lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, to-wit:

No. 1. TWELVE HUNDRED ACRES OF A TRACT OF LAND CALLED "DECAPOLIS" AND IMPROVEMENTS thereon, situate in Election District No. 6, Garrett county, Maryland, and described in a deed from Fanny E. Stockbridge, widow, and Henry Stockbridge, Jr., and wife, James A. Garey and wife and William T. Carson and wife to Joseph F. and Hanson B. Lewis, bearing date April 27th, 1895, and recorded in Liber E. Z. T. No. 26, folio 575, &c., one of the land records of Garrett county, Maryland. This land, or so much thereof as may be necessary, will be sold to pay and satisfy the taxes due and in arrear thereon for the year 1897, as is charged on the assessment books of said Garrett county in the name of Joseph F. and Hanson B. Lewis.

TERMS OF SALE:—Cash on day of sale. The right of redemption extends to six calendar months from day of sale by paying to the purchaser the amount of the purchase money with interest thereon at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum and all costs. Conveyancing at cost of purchaser.

THOMAS B. WILEY,
Late Treasurer.

Examiners' Notice.

Notice is hereby given that the undersigned, appointed by the County Commissioners of Garrett county, to view the road prayed to be changed, known as the White and King road, and examine whether the said changed road should be located, will meet on the 15th day of July, 1901, for such purpose, and to determine whether the public convenience requires the said changed location of said White and King road, and if so, to locate the same, and perform their duty in the premises.

The Government crop reports just published show a fairly high average of condition and considering the fact that the acreage throughout the West is larger than in any previous year it removes any apprehension concerning the crops for the current year.

Col. George A. Pearre, Mayor Warren C. White, of Cumberland, and Mr. Thomas H. Hobbs, also of Cumberlrnd, were at Lake Browning last Saturday fishing. They arrived here on Friday night and drove to the lake, returning here the following evening where a train was taken for their homes.

Mayor and Mrs. J. W. W. Davis, of Piedmont, have issued cards for the marriage of their daughter, Miss Grace Davis, to Prof. Arta Frank Hawkins, of Philippi. The ceremony will take place in St. John's Methodist Episcopal church South, Piedmont, Wednesday, June 26. Prof. Hawkins is assistant principal of the Piedmont free school.

Escaping gas in Christ Reformed Episcopal church at Cumberland Sunday morning caused an explosion, which wrecked the church and the residence of Mrs. Philip Rhodes, adjoining. The rector, the Rev. Ephriam Phillips, Jr., detected the presence of gas when he opened the church for early service, and in investigating with a light set fire to the substance, narrowly escaping serious injury in the wreck that followed.

Candidates for nomination for the various offices to be filled this fall have been in evidence in Oakland the past few days. As high as a dozen were counted on the street Tuesday morning and all buttonholing people within a radius of a block. The fight is becoming quite spirited but up to this time it is a friendly one and we trust that it will continue as such. There will be but few sore spots after the nominations.

A writer comparing the local newspaper with the city papers, defending them from the facetious and illnatured attacks of the latter, says: "Well, you may poke fun at the country weekly as you will, but I fail to see why the fact that a resident has bought the place of another resident and intends to move into it may not be well worth chronicling in the local paper as the fact that a dog of a famous actress died on the steamer is worth a two column picture and a half column description in the dailies. Blamed if I can see much difference between a poodle dog editorial in a city daily, and one about a big cabbage just laid on the desk of ye editor of a country weekly."

Mr. Lewis Milholland, of Cumberland, was in Oakland Friday night.

Townshend & Son's line of trunks and valises is the largest and cheapest in town. 14 4

Four thousand tons of earth and stone fell down a hillside and over a cliff at a quarry near Keyser early Saturday morning. The people were awakened by the noise and thought it was an earthquake. Blasting out stone had losened the earth. It will require the entire quarry force a month to remove the fallen mass.

The Supreme Court will soon be called upon to decide how far above the earth's surface a real estate title extends. The question involves the power of a municipality to limit the height of buildings. The decision will be a matter of great interest to every resident of a city, whether he be a a property owner or not.

You may as well expect to run a steam engine without water as to find an active, energetic man with a torpid liver and you may know that his liver is torpid when he don't relish his food or feels dull and languid after eating, often has headache and sometimes dizziness. A few doses of Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets will restore his liver to its normal functions, renew his vitality, improve his digestion and make him feel like a new man. Price, 25 cents. Samples free at all drug stores.

Peter Maroney, of Oakland, who has been engaged for some weeks past as timekeeper for the railroad workmen operating at Mountain Lake Park, was struck on the head Saturday by a shovel which became entangled in some ropes connected with the steam shovel. His head was very badly cut and for some time he was unconscious as a result of the accident. He was brought home on train 55 the same evening and has been under treatment since.

It seemed cruel that great stalwart, intellectual giants should burden upon the poor little mosquito, whose average life is about three days in length, and the frisky mouse that lives until puss gets sight of him, the crime of spreading malarial germs. But now comes a man with the statement that fully 80 per cent of the cases of malarial fever suffered by the soldier lads have been spread by the common house fly. We'll wager heavy that this fellow is a promoter of a combination to manufacture some new "tangle foot" for the poor fly to sit down on.

Call at druggists' and get a free sample of Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets. They are an elegant physic. They also improve the appetite, strengthen the digestion and regulate the bowels. They are easy to take and pleasant in effect.

The rain last week made things disagreeable for everybody. Summer visitors are here in large numbers and should the weather settle down the inflow of guests to the hotels will be augmented to a great degree.

A severe sprain will usually disable the injured person for three or four weeks. Many cases have occured, however, in which a cure has been effected in less than one week by applying Chamberlain's Pain Balm. For sale by all dealers.

Two of the attractions this year at the Park will be General Fitzhugh Lee and Lieutenant Richard Pearson Hobson. Both will deliver lectures. Immense crowds may be expected on the days they are to be present.

FOR SALE:—The Lutheran parsonage, located on the corner of Fifth and Green streets, in Oakland, near the court house. Contains 8 rooms, hallway, cellar and porches; excellent well of water. Will be sold cheap. Apply to or address Rev. George I. Uhler, Oakland, Md.

Harland L. Jones Honored.

Harland Livingstone Jones, son of Mr. and Mrs. Scott T. Jones, of Oakland, graduated last Thursday from Linsley Institute, Wheeling, at the head of his class, this position having been obtained by the young man by hard work and application to his studies. At the exercises, which were held at the fair grounds, a magnificent gold medal was presented to Mr. Jones, the presentation speech being delivered by Congressman Dovener, who said in part:

"Graduating date (to the young man) is the most interesting period in life. It crystalizes the memory, the pleasures of the past and all the young man's aspirations for the future. Behind is a dream, to come is the awakening. Whether you succeed or not the associations which end to-day will be an ever-green, and pleasant spot in your recollections of past life. You are just emerging practically into a world of opportunities, and blessed by a residence in a country where all these are open we are proud to say to the high and low, the rich and poor alike, there is no caste or aristocracy recognized so much with us as the aristocracy of merit. We assemble here to-day to pay tribute to those who deserve recognition and reward of merit.

"Boys, you are graduates of an honorable and grand institution of learning. It has one other feature which I desire to commend. It teaches patriotism. In this country where we do not depend entirely on a standing army, but where all stand by, defend and follow the flag, if necessity requires, such schools have the nursery qualifications to make volunteer soldiers and officers for the same. I have noticed with pride the proficiency of your course and drill and cannot express too highly my admiration for the same; but not to detain you too long—you have just passed through this term and ended the same. You have naturally all had ambitions to surpass each other in proficiency of examinations. I am glad to know that this has been conducted on the true principle of honorable competition and emulation without envy. Some weeks since I expressed a determination in some substantial manner to prove my friendship as well as admriation for your class on to-day, and this I now do by presenting to Harland Livingstone Jones, who has won the honorable distinction of leading and having the highest average in the classical course, this medal as an evidence and recognition of his success. May your future ever be as bright and crowned with success as at present."

Drowned at Bloomington.

About 11 o'clock Monday morning John Williams, a butcher of Westernport, attempted to ford the Potomac river at Bloomington with a wagon and two horses. The river being very high and the ford rough, a wheel of the wagon struck a large boulder, upsetting the wagon and tangling up Mr. Williams with the harness. He was drowned. He had with him Tip Moran and Charles Jones, but neither of these men was in the wagon at the time of the accident. Every effort was made to save Mr. Williams, but without success, and up to this time his remains had not been recovered. He was about forty years of age and went from Lonaconing to Westernport, where he had opened up a meat market.

Bowman Elected Captain.

"Billy" Bowman has been elected captain of the baseball team for next year, receiving all the votes cast. He is one of the most popular men on the team and has been one of its main stays. Besides being a fine ball player he has stood well in his classes. Athletics in the West Virginia University are vastly different from those in most schools as they have to be good students and have a certain standing in their classes before they are allowed to play. Bowman will probably return to school next year. —Dominion.

Peculiar Death of a Rattler.

Ken Browning, of near town, was here Saturday and said that near the Youghiogheny river bridge where the Baltimore and Ohio crosses that stream, he found a large yellow rattlesnake coiled up along the rail. The reptile was dead but was coiled as if to strike. He examined it and found that a portion of its head had been severed by a passing train. He secured the rattles, eight in number, and exhibited them to a number of persons in town.

Notice.

I beg to announce to the citizens of Garrett county that I have returned to Oakland to locate permanently to practice law, after an absence of several years, during which time I have been engaged in the practice of law in Washington, D. C. I solicit the patronage of clients of the late firm of Veitch & Townshend and that of other citizens as well.

Will be assisted in imported cases by an able and experienced lawyer. Prompt attention will be given to all business placed in my care.

Offices in the McComas building, Oakland, Md.

PERCY H. VEITCH,
15 6t Attorney at Law.

Note of Thanks.

We, the husband and children of Mrs. Catharine Bancord, deceased, desire to thank all our friends and neighbors for their kindness and services rendered during the long illness of wife and mother and herein express our gratitude for the same.

Adjournment of Convocation.

The convocation of the archdeaconry of Cumberland which met here last week, adjourned on Friday night. Rev. William Dunbar Gould of Lonaconing, preached the convocational sermon.

Honors For Miss DeBerry.

At the closing exercises of the Western Maryland College, Westminster, which were held last Wednesday morning, Miss Edith Almedia DeBerry, daughter of Mr. and Mrs Clark DeBerry, of near Oakland, received the gold medal of the female junior class.

Was Fined for Being Dead.

John Davis was picked up on the streets of Wheeling, W. Va., pronounced dead by two doctors, sat upon by a coroner's jury, which found that death was due to heart failure, removed to the undertaker's and within ten minutes sat up and sang the doxology. He was hustled into court and fined $5 for drunkenness. The doctors and the coroner's jury were not fined.

A Narrow Escape.

John Smith, of Corinth, West Va., attempted to board a train at the station here on last Friday night and was thrown between the cars and the platform. The space in which he laid was less than eighteen inches but he retained his presence of mind and came out of the predicament with a few bruises and the major portion of his clothing cut to pieces. His coat was literally ground up and his trousers suffered a like fate. After he had been examined by one of the physicians and no serious injury discovered he went to the water station and got on another train bound east.

Church Notice.

Immediately following the morning services in St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church a congregational meeting will be held when officials for the ensuing year will be elected.

Badly Injured.

Joe Galloway, of Ryan's Glade, who has been employed for some time as a truckman on G. J. Lee's saw mill near Gorman, met with an accident one day last week which may result in his death. He was engaged in driving a truck upon which was loaded several thousand feet of lumber and to which a team was attached. In going along the tramway he stumbled and fell, the front wheel of the truck catching his heel and as he was stretched along the rail the wheel followed his leg up to the thigh. He could not be released from his predicamedt until some men ran from the mill and hitching the horse to the rear of the truck pulled it back. He was taken to his home where he now is.

School Tax.

On Saturday State Comptroller Joshua W. Herring made the quarterly distribution of the State School Tax, payable on and after June 25th. Of the amount distributed Garrett county receives—

For white schools, $2,569.36; for colored schools, $33.13.

Proposed Change of a Dangerous Road.

At the recent meeting of the Board of County Commissioners examiners were appointed to view and relocate the Crellin road where it leads from the end of Liberty street down the steep hill to the Washington Spring Bridge over the Little Youghiogheny River. This hill at all times and seasons is a very dangerous one as at its foot it leads across the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. One driving down the hill is unable to see a train approaching from the east until the tracks are reached as the view is obstructed by an embankment. Only very recently a wagon heavily ladened got from under the control of the driver while descending this hill and at the same time a train was approaching. It was only by the hardest kind of work that a fatal accident was averted. The proposed change in the road will locate it at a point considerable further west than the present location as it will cross the stream further down. Passing through the bottom lands of the Bradley farm a bridge will be erected which will carry it through the baseball grounds and tap the present road at a point at the south end of the grounds.

Begin in Time.

Daniel Webster said: "If we work upon marble, it will perish; if we work upon brass, time will efface it; if we rear temples, they will crumble into dust; but if we work upon immortal minds, if we imbue them with right principles, with the just fear of God and love of our fellow-men, we engrave on those tablets something which will be bright to all eternity."

These are true and eloquent words, worthy of such an intellect and such a statesman. If you had asked Mr. Webster when to begin to imbue immortal minds with right principles he would have said "In childhood." Every crooked tree in the forest began to grow crooked when it was young. You cannot straighten it now. It is too late. Your opportunity is gone. These drunkards and gamblers and harlots about us can never regain all they have lost of purity and sweetness and innocence. The power of good can save them if they seek to be saved. It is said a new life may give them blossoms and fruit, but they still will be crooked trees in the world's great forest. Let us not neglect these tender plants in our homes. They need our care—they must have it now if we wish them to grow up straight and noble and godly. GEO. H. NOCK.

True as Gospel.

An exchange says the local newspaper is the advertising medium through which the business men reach the farmer trade. With the good, honest and industrious farmer, his regular home paper is his first choice in newspaper reading. He has most usually one or two and reads them closely. He notes the ads, their changes and the prices quoted pretty closely on all staple articles of food and dress. He is not like a majority of town folks, glutted with dailies and weeklies until the reading is a mere scanning. The business man who keeps his prices and goods well represented in his home paper is the man who catches the trade. The old farmer and his wife read the ads and quietly decide where they will trade when next in town, and when they decide they mean business. The town trade is good so far as it goes, but the country trade and purchase exchange is the backbone of any business.

Wesley Beatty Goes Over.

The case of J. Wesley Beatty from Preston county which went to the Supreme Court on a writ of error will not be heard at the present term. It was laid over until the next meeting of the court in September. In the meantime he will live fat. The case should be decided promptly. There is no doubt in the world that he committed a cold-blooded murder and he ought to be punished and punished quickly. There has been too much foolishness of this kind in Preston county.

State Census.

TO A DEAD MINSTREL.

Beside the maple's mossy foot
The hermit thrush lies dead,
Among the white anemonies,
Like tapers 'round its bed.

Its downy breast of dappled gray,
Its russet wings are still,
Its velvet throat will never more
With heavenly music thrill.

At evening's golden afterglow
What happiness was mine
To hear from out the leafy choir
That evensong divine.

So pure and sweet that other sounds
Seemed hushed in silent prayer
The while that matchless melody
Filled all the listening air.

Sweet minstrel of the twilight hour,
When purple shadows creep
Through dimly-lighted forest aisles
And flowers close in sleep—

Is there no land beyond the stars
Where we shall hear again
Thy hymn of perfect peace and joy
When life is free from pain?

Shall we alone, with sordid lives
Misspent and prone to sin,
Of all God's children be the few
Eternal life to win?

Each day you did the Father's will
And praised Him with a psalm,
Whose peace fell on the troubled heart,
Like Gilead's healing balm.

And cannot He who made the suns
And sees the sparrow's fall
Provide a home so fair and large
That it will shelter all?

ON THE TRAIL OF THE TOTEM BEAR

By William Murray Graydon.

TWO men stood on the primitive landing stage at Nuchuk, the little Alaskan settlement whose huts and cabins clustered round an indentation of Cook's inlet. A short distance out in the harbor the cargo steamer Yukon lay at anchor.

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" said Markham, an elderly and experienced trader, who was the company's agent at Nuchuk. "You must decide quickly, for there ain't much time. Better stop over for the next boat. It's a rare chance, for you are sure to fetch back a totem bear—perhaps a couple of 'em."

"And the risk of Indians? The tribes on the headwaters of the Copper river have a bad name."

"They won't molest us," Markham replied, hurriedly. "Come, what do you say?" he added. "The Yukon sails within the hour."

"Let her sail," exclaimed Quin, with sudden decision. "I don't go with her—I've chosen for the totem bear."

Two days later Quin and Markham, with ten hired coast Indians, were traveling north. A journey of 120 miles through an unexplored region, attended with numerous difficulties and hardships, brought them to a good-sized tributary of the Copper river. Here they camped, and a fortnight was spent in constructing from felled trees, by the aid of what tools they had been able to transport, a long, narrow barge with a tiny cabin in the middle. This was completed one evening, and the next morning the Indians were missing to a man.

The two voyagers embarked the following morning, and three days later, towards the close of the afternoon, they were drifting on the deep, rapid tide of the Copper river.

"When are we going to tie up?" asked Quin.

"Oh, any time you like. We had better slip on a mile or two, though." As Markham spoke his face brightened and his perplexed expression vanished. He stood in a listening attitude, gazing at a tall pinnacle or rock that had suddenly been revealed by a curve of the channel. From far down the river floated a dull, roaring noise.

"There are rapids yonder," he added. "We'll lay up here for the night, and run them in the morning."

He bent to the oar, and within five minutes the boat was alongside the right-hand shore, where it was made fast to the stump of a tree. It lay in deep, swift water, off the end of a promontory that jutted a dozen yards into the river. Immediately below was the mouth of a valley.

"By heavens, look yonder!" exclaimed Markham.

Glancing in line with his companion's outstretched arm, Quin beheld a huge animal standing 20 feet away at the edge of the timber. He had no need to ask what it was. He knew that he was in the presence of a totem bear—the first he had seen.

For a brief instant, swinging its massive head, the brute surveyed the two men. Then, with a sudden growl, it turned and galloped clumsily into the forest.

"I must have that bear!" cried Quin. "It's a pity to shoot him, but I can't take him alive."

When they had gone nearly a mile up the valley the big footprints seemed to suddenly disappear. They pushed on for 100 yards, then stopped. Night was close at hand, and the forest was as dim as twilight.

"We've lost the brute!" exclaimed Quin.

"Yes, he must have turned off the path," said Markham. "We'll go a little farther."

They left the path, bore for a short distance to the left through the trees and emerged on a small clearing. They saw before them, standing darkly against the purple twilight, a low, square structure of logs. It resembled a hut, though it had neither door nor window, and on the top of it squatted a huge carved image—a totem bear.

"There must be a village near by," whispered Quin. "This looks like the burial place of an Indian chief."

"That's what it is—a chief's grave," Markham replied, eagerly. "I'm in luck to find the spot again."

"What are you doing?" exclaimed Quin, as his companion climbed to the top of the structure. "Come down. Don't desecrate the dead."

"It's all right," was the reply. "There's something in here I want—"

As he spoke his weight caused the grave to suddenly collapse, and with a crash logs and totem fell in a sprawling ruin, a quick leap saving Markham from injury.

He landed on his feet and uttered a sharp cry of alarm. A great dusky animal, erect on its hind legs, was shuffling towards the two men. It was the totem bear they had tracked.

Markham's rifle flew to his shoulder, but with marvelous rapidity, with a rasping growl of rage, the beast struck the weapon a blow that snapped it in two. Markham sprang back, and the next instant the loud report of Quin's rifle was heard. Hit in a vital part, the monstrous bear came heavily to earth, gave a few convulsive struggles and lay still.

"You've done it," said Markham, "and there will be the devil to pay now! Listen!"

"Indians!" exclaimed Quin.

"Yes; you've stirred up the village—it's just over yonder. Heaven help us if we are caught!"

"We must cut and run for it!"

"Yes! But wait one moment."

With that Markham plunged into the ruins of the grave, piled the logs this way and that, and quickly emerged with a heavy canvas bag a foot and a half long in his two hands.

"Gold! gold!" he cried, breathlessly. "I'll explain later."

By good luck they struck the path, and by what little light was left they were able to follow it. It was a race for life, and the odds were with the pursuers. The Indians gained steadily.

"Give them a shot if you can," gasped Markham.

Quin turned and fired, aiming at a dark object. A yell of agony echoed through the forest.

From close in the rear they heard the crashing undergrowth, a blood-curdling snarl, and then the quick, muffled patter of heavy feet.

"It's another bear—the mate to the dead one!" exclaimed Markham. "Shoot it!"

"I MUST HAVE THAT BEAR," CRIED QUINN.

But as Quin turned with that intention he tripped over the bole of a tree and the rifle flew out of his hands. He groped after it vainly for a few seconds—he dared not pause longer—and then he rose and overtook his companion, to whom he related his loss. The bear was in hot pursuit, growling with fury.

"Drop the gold, you idiot!" shouted Quin.

"Never! I'll save it or die!"

But they were nearer to the river than they supposed, and a moment later they burst out of the forest and ran to the end of the spit of land. Side by side they leaped aboard the boat, Markham dropping the bag of gold with a crash, while Quin instantly severed the mooring rope with a stroke of his knife.

But the bear was at their heels, and without hesitation, just as the craft swung off the shore, the angry animal sprang in at the stern. He made a rush for the two men, who barely in time escaped to the cabin and closed and barred the door.

"We're lost!" cried Markham. "We have no firearms, and it's sure death to try to get to the sweep. The falls are just below—the worst in all Alaska—and they'll smash us to bits."

"You seem to know a lot about it," said Quin, hoarsely. "Man, you have deceived me."

"I have," admitted the wretched trader. "But I meant it for the best. I was up here four years ago after gold, and when the Indians got after us we hid the stuff in that grave. My two comrades were killed and I had a narrow squeak of it myself. That's why I wanted to come back—to recover the bag of gold. I intended to divide with you, but I was afraid that if I told you before we started—"

Of what happened next Quin retained afterward only a blurred recollection, but by clinging to a part of the cabin he survived the peril of wave and reef, and finally floated ashore in a greatly exhausted state several miles below the scene of the disaster. The gold was at the bottom of the river, and both the bear and Markham had been drowned—there was no doubt of that.

Quin spent a day in searching vainly for the trader's body, and then, having started on foot toward the coast, he found an Indian canoe. In this he paddled down the stream, subsisting on fruits and berries during the journey, and a week later he safely arrived at Nuchuk, little the worse for his terrible experience.—Boston Globe.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

The fair Rosamond was an English blonde, with fair hair and blue or light gray eyes.

Three hundred and twenty-five miles in a day is the record for a sailing ship, 560 for a steamer.

Pomades are made of the best and purest fat of the ox, impregnated with any perfume which may be desirable.

During the reign of Queen Elizabeth the extension of English commerce resulted in a remarkable development of the English language, and by association with foreign nations thousands of words unknown before in England were brought into common use.

The first alcoholic perfume was Hungary water, made from rosemary by Elizabeth of Hungary, 1370, she having procured the recipe from a Hungarian hermit. This perfume became popular throughout all Europe in that and the succeeding century.

The shipments of lemons from California in 1900 were 1,447 cars by rail, about 400 by water and 150 in mixed cars of oranges and lemons, amounting to 2,000 cars, which is about one-fifth of the lemons used in this country, an increase over 1899 of nearly one-twelfth.

The Roman empire had a system of paved roads, radiating from Rome in every direction, to the utmost limits of Roman territory. One great road led across the Alps into Gaul, to a point near Calais, and beginning again in Britain it ran directly north to the wall of Severns; another down the valley of the Danube, and from Constantinople east, through Syria and Palestine, to the Euphrates. Still another ran west, along the seacoast into Spain, while Africa had its own system.

NEARLY MISSED HIS TRAIN.

Tom Reed's Persistent Friend Placed Him in an Uncomfortable State.

Ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed was in a great hurry to get out of Philadelphia the other day, not that he loved the Quaker city less than New York, but because he had an important business engagement in the latter city. Arriving at the depot just about train time, he got pretty well tangled up in a rather thrilling experience for a man of his weight. He was making for the train at quite a lusty pace when he was buttonholed—actually—by a wiry little old man, who looked as though he might have come from West Chester.

"Why, how are you, Tom?" exclaimed the whiskered party, shaking the politician's reluctantly extended hand.

"Eh—why, I think you've got the best of me—I don't remember you," returned Mr. Reed, sort of perturbed, for he could see that he had but a half-minute to spare.

"Well, if that don't beat all—"

"You'll have to pardon me, I've got to make my train," interrupted Mr. Reed.

"Don't be in a hurry," insisted the other, taking a firm grip on the ex-speaker's lapel, "you'll think who I am in a minute."

"But I haven't time to think." Mr. Reed shook himself loose and started for the gate. He heard a little bell tinkle and the gate closed in his face.

"Let me through!" cried Mr. Reed, excitedly. The man at the gate paid no heed to him. Close at hand was an open gate for a local train. Mr. Reed rushed through it and trotted down the platform after the express, which was just getting under way. He was breathing hard, but he managed to make a final spurt and clutch the rail of the last car. Yet he was not out of the woods, for he found it was one thing to have and another thing to hold, and still another thing to get aboard. He was swinging behind like the tail of a kite when the brakeman came to his rescue. He caught Mr. Reed by the collar and tried to drag him aboard. The brakeman would have failed in his noble effort had he not been aided by two porters, who gallantly shoved from behind while the brakeman pulled from above. The job was finished, though not without damage to Mr. Reed's apparel and at the expense of much perspiration.

As Mr. Reed stood on the back platform mopping his brow he could see the figure of his old-forgotten acquaintance at the gateway, and above the rumble of the train he heard these words: "I used to be your milkman."

Corners in the Living Room.

A very pretty corner may be arranged in any living-room by means of a screen and a divan. Over the divan there may be, if you choose, a canopy, and plenty of cushions are indispensable to its easeful luxury. But a screen answers every purpose of retirement and withdrawal and, being readily portable, lends itself to the housekeeper's requirements. In country cottages where space is important not only corners may be secured at pleasure, and furnished at discretion by the help of the screen, but one room may be made to do duty as several—as dining-room, library and drawing-room, as one of these at a time or as all three, should occasion suggest.—Washington Star.

CHANGING THE WEATHER.

What Some Scientists Have Accomplished in This Direction.

Involuntary influence exists without doubt; it is exercised, for instance, by deforestation and by the resulting alteration of conditions of soil, which modifies the flowing of streams and increases inundations; and also by the development of industrial activity, as Russel has shown in the case of London fogs, which augment considerably with increased consumption of coal. The considerable increase of the number of thunderstorms, which has doubled since 1870, leads us to believe that in this case also there is an effect due, in part, at least, to industrial activity; for it is difficult to attribute an increase so considerable to the sole action of sun spots, says Cosmos, of Paris. An attempt has been made to explain the increase in the number of storms by the abundant production of steam by industrial engines. Dr. Trabert cannot accept this explanation, for he calculates that the quantity of steam thus produced in the whole of Germany would scarcely represent an evaporation of 0.0025 millimeter of water to the square kilometer (1-4000 inch to the square mile). But it is quite different with particles of dust scattered in great abundance throughout the air by the incomplete combustion of a quantity of coal equal to 200 kilograms to the square kilometer (1,140 pounds to a square mile). This considerable increase of atmospheric dust should exercise an action on the production of rain. When moist air passes the state of saturation, condensation takes place on particles of dust. The more there are of these, the more drops are formed; thus, for a given quantity of vapor condensed, the drops are necessarily smaller. Now the tension of saturation on a convex surface increases with the curvature of the surface, that is to say, with the smallness of the drops. An increase of the quantity of dust in the air will therefore tend to favor the supersaturation of the air, and consequently to produce thunderstorms and abundant rains.

It is much more interesting, however, to know whether we may voluntarily act upon the weather. To this kind of action belong the attempts made successfully in France, on a large scale, to prevent nocturnal frosts by the production of artificial clouds. But when we come to the artificial production of rain, success is much more doubtful, as all attempts, so far, have proved. In the production of any phenomenon it is always a question of the equivalent transformation of one kind of energy into another, and we must inquire whether the necessary amount of energy is at our disposal. Now Trabert calculates that to bring to saturation a cubic kilometer (one-quarter cubic mile) of air at 40 per cent. relative humidity requires no less than 1,400 kilogrammeters of work (10,000 foot pounds). This scarcely allows us to think of the possibility of artificial condensation. Such a thing would appear to be possible only if the conditions necessary to condensation already existed, and if we had only to put latent forces into action. Finally, to this voluntary action on the weather belongs the method, used in the Austrian Alps since the time of Emperor Joseph II., of making numerous explosions to ward off a hailstorm, a process that, as is well known, has been developed and systematized by M. Steger at Wandisch-Feistritz, in southern Styria, with great success.

HE WAS NOT A LINGUIST.

Predicament of a Waiter Who Was Not Well Posted on Foreign Languages.

He pulled himself up at the hotel table, tucked his napkin under his chin, picked up the bill of fare and began to study it intently. Everything was in restaurant French, and he did not like it, says Tit-Bits.

"Here, waiter," he said, sternly, "there's nothing on this I want."

"Ain't there nothin' you would like for dinner, sir?" inquired the waiter, politely.

"Have you got any sine qua non?"

The waiter gasped.

"No, sir," he replied.

"Got any bona fide?"

"N-no, sir."

"Got any semper eadem?"

"No, sir, we haven't."

"Got any jeu d'esprits?"

"No, sir; not one."

"Got any tempus fugit?"

"I reckon not, sir."

"Got any soiree dansantes?"

"No, sir."

The waiter was edging off.

"Got any sine die?"

"We ain't, sir."

"Got any pluribus unum?"

The waiter's face showed some signs of intelligence.

"Seems to me I heerd of that, sir," and he rushed out to the kitchen, only to return empty handed.

"Maybe you've got some beef and cabbage and a gooseberry tart?"

"Sure we have, sir," exclaimed the waiter in a tone of the utmost relief, and he fairly flew out to the kitchen.

Twas Johnson.

It was in Magistrate Brann's court a few days ago. A frail little white woman had her husband, a strong, big negro, up for non-support. She said that he would not support her, because he was jealous of another man, who had paid her some attention. The magistrate heard the story, and then turned toward the prisoner and asked:

"Well, Mr. Othello, what have you to say to that?"

The policeman who made the arrest leaned over and whispered to the magistrate:

"His name isn't Othello, your honor," he said. "It's Johnson."—N. Y. Sun.

The Fat Woman's Failure.

At a local amusement resort the lecturer is accustomed to wax eloquent over the graces of a certain fat lady, who gives many exhibitions a day on a stationary bicycle. The other night there was a tear in the speaker's eye and a quiver in his voice as he told of mademoiselle's appearance before the crowned heads of Europe.

"Yes, there was the prince of Wales' friend," he sobbed, with an emotional wave of the hand. "He saw her, loved her and would have followed her to America, but for the protestations of his mother, Queen Victoria."

"Yis," supplemented the fair object of the prince's affections. "Yis, he knowed a good thing whin he seen it." There wasn't a dry eye in the house.—Boston Record.

Found at Last.

When we suffer, Time seems to lag, and days, with leaden feet, creep slowly by. But, when relief comes, the past is forgotten in the light of a happy future. When Mr. T. B. Cutler was living in Cincinnati, Ohio, he wrote: "Palmer's Lotion has cured me of Tetter, with which I had been afflicted for over twelve years, and from which I could find no permanent relief until I used this wonderful preparation." This is the testimony of another sufferer who truthfully calls Palmer's Lotion "wonderful." If your druggist hasn't it, send to Solon Palmer, 374 Pearl Street, New York, for samples of Palmer's Lotion and Lotion Soap.

Treatment By Specialists.

In medical circles it is an acknowledged fact that development and progress in the profession have been so swift and far-reaching in recent years that it has been an utter impossibility for the regular practitioner, constantly called upon to treat practically all diseases, to keep pace with the rapid advance of knowledge and skill in the many special lines of the science. Out of this condition the specialist has arisen.

An association of these specialists under the name of the Interstate Physicians League has been formed for the purpose of treating chronic diseases, such as nervous dyspepsia and other digestive disorders, liver and kidney diseases, chronic constipation and diarrhœa, etc.

A careful and accurate diagnosis of each case treated is first made. Then the case is turned over to the proper specialist who, from then on, takes charge of the case individually and gives it his best thought and attention.

Full particulars, a descriptive booklet, etc., will be forwarded upon application.

A ROYAL EXAMPLE.

Young Queen of Holland Is a Teetotaler and Seeks to Influence Others to Become Such.

As an illustration of what influential persons can do in behalf of temperance the Free Baptist tells of the influence of Queen Wilhelmina of Holland over her court. It is well known that drink is one of the curses of Holland, and this queen's father and predecessor was a great drunkard. So great has been the young queen's influence that her husband, Henry Mecklenburg-Schwerin, who was well known to his army companions as a persistent drinker, has become a total abstainer. Many other members of the court have given up drinking habits. The queen never touches alcoholic liquor. While the most costly wines are always on the royal table on state occasions, neither the queen nor her mother ever allow their glasses to be filled. Those about the court have found out that the surest way to the queen's favor is to follow her example in the matter of total abstinence. If more of the crowned heads and those high and influential in public and social life would set such an example there would soon be a great decrease in drunkenness. We commend this as truly a royal example.

QUEEN WILHELMINA.

ALCOHOL AS A MEDICINE.

Experience Demonstrates That There Is No Excuse Whatever for Using It in That Capacity.

It is a very common thing even among strong temperance people to use wine or liquors for nearly every ailment; it is still considered a universal remedy for everything. How much of this idea is true we can learn from the words of a very prominent physician and temperance worker: "It is well that the human nature is so strong, that it can resist not only the sickness but also the alcohol."

In fact, there is at the present time no excuse whatever for using alcohol as a medicine. The physiological action of it is such that it not only does not help where it is intended to do so, but instead causes much harm; acting sometimes quite contrary from what it is expected. Especially is this the case when an alcoholic drink, whether warm or cold, is given for a cold or for any lung or throat trouble. As is well known, alcohol lowers the temperature of the body to such an extent that even the hot drink does no good. The very best thing for a cold is hot egg lemonade. Heat is needed and alcohol takes away the natural heat of the body.

It is about the same in stomach troubles. Alcohol burns the stomach and temporarily paralyzes the feeling of pain. But it also inflames the stomach, and thus causes a much worse trouble than the one it is hoped to cure.

Examples can be multiplied; it is just the same with everything. Alcohol is of no use as a medicine.

But, you ask, why do so many doctors prescribe liquors, wines and malt beverages for sick people? First, I will say, that the number of doctors doing so grows smaller every day. Further, that they do not prescribe them because they are convinced of their good effects, but simply because their patients want them.

A temperance man called a doctor to his sick wife. "She must have some port wine," said the doctor. "No," the man answered, "she is a temperance woman and will not take wine."

"That is the most sensible thing I have heard for a long time. Give her some unfermented grape juice, that is a hundred times better."

Every doctor who keeps up with the times would say the same thing, if he could give his honest opinion.

Only a few years ago most medicine was given in the form of strong alcoholic tinctures or extracts. Today the favorite form is a powder or a compressed tablet? Why? Because the alcohol did as much harm as the medicine did good.

Do we need more testimony?—B. F. Hockert, in International Good Templar.

The resignation of Mayor George P. McKee, of Logansport, Ind., was demanded in a resolution passed by the city council in regular session on May 1. McKee is charged with drinking to excess.—Union Signal.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS.

Temperance Sentiment Growing and Crystallizing Into Positive Action.

Notwithstanding there is much to discourage the temperance worker, and he seems to fight against a gigantic evil whose overthrow appears wellnigh impossible, still there are encouraging signs, rifts in the clouds through which the light occasionally breaks, revealing brighter things beyond. Temperance sentiment is growing and intensifying, and one of the certain signs of the times is that, with combinations in the financial, commercial and industrial world, there is coming the desire on the part of those holding decided views on economic, sociological or moral questions to stand together and unite forces in working out the particular problem demanding their attention.

It seems to one observer, at least, that the temperance people are the most backward in this particular, but slowly and surely are the division lines separating them being obliterated, and the temperance workers are coming into closer sympathy and touch than ever before.

Political, social and religious differences are being forgotten in the one purpose of successfully overthrowing the liquor curse. The churches of the land are the uncompromising foe of King Alcohol, and are the centers from which must radiate the power and sentiment that will accomplish his overthrow. The Catholic church is opposed to the liquor traffic, and is awakening to its responsibility towards this great question. The report from Dubuque, Ia., is that Archbishop Keane continues to insist vigorously that his parishioners get out of the saloon business, or at least that they conform to the laws by closing on Sunday and refusing to sell liquor to drunkards or minors. "If Catholic saloonkeepers continue to disobey," he said, "I shall be obliged to instruct my priests to refuse them the sacraments of the church."

At Wilkesbarre, Pa., has just occurred a most remarkable scene, the taking of the oath of total abstinence by an entire congregation of 1,168 persons. It was made the occasion of a most interesting and impressive service. Led by 100 white-gowned girls, each crowned with an evergreen wreath and marshaled by a dozen visiting priests, the entire congregation of the Holy Saviour Roman Catholic church of Wilkesbarre marched up the hill to the edifice at dusk and there took the pledge of total abstinence.

This act marked the culmination of the work of Rev. Father J. J. Curran, the pastor, who is president of the Catholic Temperance union, of the Scranton diocese. After the girls came the boys of the congregation, in uniform, and all carrying canes. Then came the men and women, all wearing uniform hats. With songs they marched into the church, and there, beginning with the girls, took the oath. It was administered by Father Curran to groups of 100, all that could stand in the space about the altar. Each and every one of 1,168 persons swore to neither taste, touch nor serve wine or spirituous liquor during his or her lifetime.

After the oath was taken by all there was a service of prayer and song and a sermon by Father O'Malley.

TEMPERANCE BREVITIES.

The board of police of Boston, Mass., announces that all liquor licenses must be paid for strictly in advance. It has been customary heretofore to grant extensions of time for payment.

About 3,000 intoxications in a lifetime is Dr. Charles L. Dana's estimate of the limit of man's endurance of alcohol. He finds that in 50 per cent. of the cases drunkards owe their condition to whisky and in 20 per cent. to beer.

Holland has her Carrie Nation in the person of Mrs. Waszkiewicz Schiefgaarde, who makes perpetual but utterly vain war on the Dutch rum demon. She has announced her intention to visit England, where she means to start a crusade.

The village council of Cannon Falls, Minn., has passed an ordinance ordering all blinds and screens to be removed from saloons on Sundays. Selling liquors on Sunday is strictly prohibited, and public sentiment will sustain the council.

An Encouraging Sign.

It is always an encouraging sign when the pulpit arraigns the liquor traffic as one of the great evils of political and social life. We have a right to expect our clergy, Protestant and Catholic, to lead in the war of extermination against the greatest enemy of home and church. In a recent discourse, Archbishop Keane, of Dubuque, Ia., denounced the traffic in vigorous terms. He said he was ashamed to see so many Catholics engaged in this business of destroying men's souls, and earnestly appealed to them to abandon it. We trust the day is not far distant when from every pulpit in the land will come urgent appeals to all voters to abandon the system of legalizing and protecting the saloon business. Back of the saloonkeeper is the citizen who makes that avocation not only possible, but politically powerful.—Union Signal.

Prohibited His Own Beer.

Recently Guinness, the great "beer baron" of Dublin, erected some model tenements for the use of working people, and among other things prohibited all intoxicating liquors; even his own beer is not allowed to be sold. Lemonade and mineral waters can be had, but intoxicants of every form are shut out. Plenty of baths but no bars. Very significant.—National Temperance Advocate.

DEAF MUTES AT THE PLAY.

More of the Unfortunates Than Usual at the Theater During the Past Season.

"One curious phase of the theatrical business of the past season has been the number of deaf mutes in the audiences," said the head usher of a New York theater. "For several years a good many deaf mutes have been attending performances of panoramas, spectacular plays and highly spiced melodramas, but this year they seem to have declared themselves in favor of high art, and have patronized dramas that are short on action, but long on talk. Deaf mutes generally attend the theater in a party. We have had them come to our house in winter in squads of 20 or 30. Mute auditors of a play always buy good seats. Being deprived of enjoyment through one of their senses, they have to make up for the loss by catering to the sense of sight and they choose seats that give a clear view of the stage. Another thing noticeable about them is the enthusiasm with which they applaud.

"At first blush it might seem strange to see so many of the deaf and dumb flocking to the theater, but they are really but little worse off than the average American who goes to see a play in a foreign tongue. The American hears, but as he is unable to understand two words of the dialogue he has to depend upon his eyes for his knowledge of the action, so in that respect he and the mutes are quits."

Gold in the Carpets.

An order has gone out from the treasury department that before the various superintendents submit their reports for the current year they shall burn the rugs and carpets on the floors of the rooms where smelting and refining of gold and silver takes place. All the old cloths, gloves and other paraphernalia used in handling the precious metals are to be burned also and careful stock taken of the residue. The government expects to save anywhere from $50,000 to $100,000 from this process. It is customary to go through this formula every year or so and glean out all flakes of gold that may have been scraped or clipped off and lost to sight. Even the towels the employes wash their hands on are saved and submitted to fire.

SPECULATION IN 1901 CENTS.

They Will Easily Bring Nineteen Dollars in the Coin Market.

A flustering young woman, out of breath as though walking fast, rushed up the steps of the mint the other day, and asked to be directed to the bureau of information. "There isn't any," replied the uniformed messenger, a very fat man, reports the Philadelphia Record. "Perhaps I can tell you what you want to know." "Perhaps you can," said the young woman, producing a copy of a frivolous weekly paper. "I want to know if this is true." She pointed to a paragraph which read: "Among the curiosities of collecting is the fact that 1901 cents now bring about $19 in the coin market."

The fat messenger adjusted his glasses and scrutinized the paragraph. While he was thus engaged the young woman explained that she had four 1901 cents, and wanted to know what made them so valuable, and where she could realize on them. Then the fat messenger grew purple in the face from suppressed laughter, which finally exploded and seemed in momentary danger of having an apopleptic fit. He called the attention of the other messengers to the paragraph, and then followed combined roars of merriment. In the meantime the young woman with the four 1901 cents wondered if she had strayed by mistake into a lunatic asylum. Finally the fat messenger regained his breath sufficiently to gasp: "It's a joke. Don't you see? I'll give you $19 for 1,901 pennies, and I'll be a cent ahead of the game. See?" A great light seemed to dawn in the mind of the young woman. "I dare say it's very funny," she said, "but I don't think such things ought to be printed." And she made her exit sorrowfully.

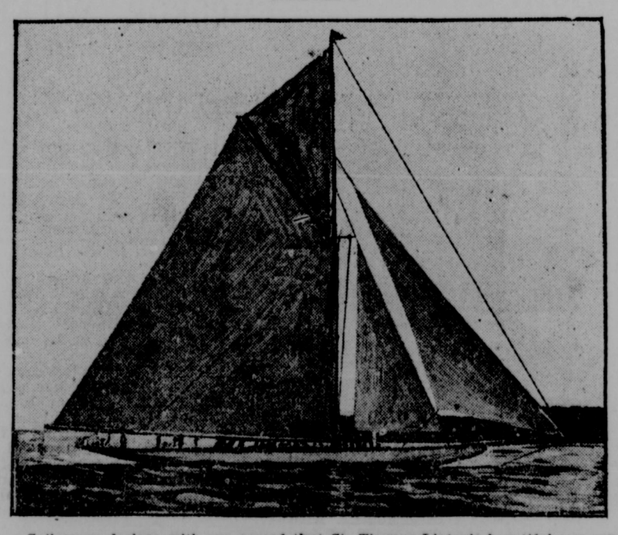
Seven Denominations in Wedding.

"The college roommate of a friend of mine was engaged to a lady in New York," writes Rev. D. M. Steele in his article on "Some People I Have Married," in Ladies' Home Journal. "His people are Congregationalists, but while at Yale he became a Unitarian. Her parents are Roman Catholics, but she was a member of the Ethical Culture society at Carnegie hall. In compliance with her mother's wish he asked five different priests to marry them, but all refused. In despair he came for me. I married them, an Episcopalian, with the ritual service in a Presbyterian chapel. The Roman Catholic brother of the bride and the Congregational sister of the groom were present. This sister acted as one witness; the other witness was a Jewess."

GEN. FREDERICK DENT GRANT, U. S. A.

After fighting in the Philippines for several years, Gen. Grant is enjoying a short holiday in the United States. His friends say that he presents a fine appearance physically, and his resemblance to his famous father, as that national hero's features are impressed in popular memory, is even greater than heretofore. He has talked freely with reporters concerning affairs in and around Manila, and is firm in the belief that the Filipinos will eventually make good Americans. In the general's district the natives celebrated Washington's birthday and are getting ready to have a glorious Fourth.

THE NEW SHAMROCK UNDER SAIL.



Sailormen declare with one accord that Sir Thomas Lipton's beautiful new cup defender is a hoodoo. In her first trial race she was beaten by Shamrock I. In her second she was badly damaged by wind and water, and nearly caused the death of King Edward of England, who was one of her passengers, as well as that of her owner and other persons of distinction. The yacht cannot be repaired in less than three months, and Sir Thomas has therefore requested the American committee to postpone the first cup race until September 21. The request has been granted.

DANGEROUS OCEAN ROADWAY.

Where Whales Are Frequently Run Into by Vessels Along the California Coast.

The coast of southern California is protected, to a certain extent, by the islands off shore. The group begins at Santa Barbara with San Miguel; then come Santa Rosa, Santa Cruz, Anacapa, and farther out to sea, 30 miles, San Nicolas. The next following south are Santa Barbara, Santa Catalina, San Clement, and then with a break of 70 miles the Coronadoes. These islands are almost parallel to the coast range and constitute virtually an out-to-sea coast range of mountains which, in all probability, were thrust up at the time the coast was formed, leaving a deep depression between them and the mainland, writes Charles Frederick Holder, in Scientific American.

This region of extremely deep water is a famous roadway for whales, several kinds being found here feeding upon the vast schools of jelly fishes which are nearly always present. The whale most common is the California gray, which goes every year to the shallows of the Gulf of California to give birth to its young, then moving north along the California coast in what is virtually a great procession. At this time the channel is the sporting ground for the huge animals, and nearly every steamer that crosses sights a school, the scene forming one of the attractions of the trip, as the whales, far from being wild or timid, sometimes evince a playful mood, or, incited by curiosity, come near the steamer, affording the passengers a near view of the largest of living animals.

This sociable disposition has resulted in several encounters between the whales and vessels in which the former have always come off second best. Some years ago a steamer on the trip from San Pedro to San Francisco struck some body, supposed at first to be a log. Several of the men were thrown to the deck; the wheel turned over so violently that the helmsman was also thrown down, and the steamer for the moment came to a standstill. All hands were called, the pumps sounded, and as the mate ran aft he saw a large whale lashing the water astern. The vessel had struck it directly back of the right paddle and evidently crushed it down, rising over it. This whale drifted into Santa Catalina some days later and was towed into one of the little bays of the coast where it was cut up by the fishermen.

During the summer of 1900 the steamer Hermosa killed a whale off San Pedro, which was at least 80 feet in length. The steamer was plowing along at a rate of 12 miles an hour, when suddenly a large whale rose directly in front of her, placing itself inadvertently across her bows, so that the blow was struck fairly. The shock created a sensation on board, and the blow was so violent that several people were thrown from their feet. It was supposed that the vessel had struck a sunken rock; she stopped for a few seconds, trembled, then rose about three feet, heeling slightly, then resumed her course, passing through a mass of blood which colored the water, showing that she had plunged into some large animal. A dead whale was sighted two days later, and for several days, on account of its size, it drifted up and down the coast with the tide, defying the efforts of speculative fishermen to secure it. Finally a heavy sea tossed it on the coast at the resort of Redondo, where it was hauled in at high tide, and when the latter went out left a marvelous spectacle of the remains of the largest of living animals. Hundreds of people visited the spot before it was dismembered. A long wound told the story of its contact with the steamer, that was wholly uninjured.

Doubtless if the records of shipping disasters were examined many instances would be found where vessels had crashed into whales with results fatal to the animal and more or less injurious to the vessel. In this connection a curious incident may be related regarding the actions of a school of whales at the island of Santa Rosa, Cal. The channel between this island is narrow and often extremely rough, and during a storm it was believed by those on the island that the whales became demoralized, as they deliberately ran ashore, and the remarkable sight of five or six large whales was observed helpless on the sands. Their bones remained for a long time on what became known as the whale's graveyard.

Ambiguous Abbreviations.

A British colonel repairing a railroad in South Africa discovered a fine empty house, which he proceeded to occupy as headquarters. When the news of the colonel's comfortable quarters reached Bloemfontein he received a teelgram which read: "G. T. M. wants house." The colonel was unable to make out what "G. T. M." meant, and inquired of officers, who translated it "general traffic manager." "All right," said the colonel, "if he can use hieroglyphics, so can I." So he wired back: "G. T. M. can G. T. H." Summoned to Bloemfontein, he was asked what he meant by sending such an insulting message to a superior officer. "Insulting," replied the colonel, innocently; "it was nothing of the kind." "But what do you mean," demanded his superior, "by telling me I can 'G. T. H.?'" "It was simply an abbreviation," replied the colonel. 'G. T. M. (general traffic manager) can G. T. H. (get the house)."—London News.

THE UNITED STATES "IS."

Excellent Authority for the Use of the Singualar Noun Given by Ex-Secretary of State.

Somebody recently criticised Gen. John W. Foster, the ex-secretary of state, because, all through his "Century of American Diplomacy," he treats "United States" as a singular noun, instead of as a plural one. This has moved the general to investigate that often mooted question with some care, and his conclusion is that, despite the wording of the constitution, there is full justification for saying "the United States is," and not "the United States are." He admits that in the early days of the republic, while the fact of it being an aggregation of sovereign states was still prominently in men's minds, the plural usage was the common one, but it was not universal, even in the beginning, and at one point in the constitution there is the phrase, "controversies to which the United States shall be a party," not "shall be parties," as strict consistency would require, says the New York Times.

Coming to precedents, Gen. Foster lists, among the statesmen who habitually employed the singular form Jefferson, Seward, Blaine, Edmunds, E. J. Phelps, Webster, Benton, Fish, Frelinghuysen, Motley, Reid, Gresham, Silas Wright, Marcy, Evarts, Bayard, C. F. Adams, Depew and Olney—certainly a long and varied category. In the earlier presidential messages the plural form prevails, but Andrew Jackson used the other, and his example, in this matter at least, has been followed by his successors, and since Lincoln all of them have invariably used the singular verb with "United States." And the general wants to know why, if we must write "the United States are," simply because the constitution has it that way, we are not also obliged to write "chuse," instead of "choose," and to retain other orthographical peculiarities which appear in the precious old document. This is hardly a fair question, since the use of "is" or "are" after "United States" involves something very different from mere spelling. Gen. Foster's usage, however, is undoubtedly that of 999 out of 1,000 American citizens of the present day, and what more or higher warrant for it does he need than that, particularly as the facts and the fashion are in completed accord?

Law to Encourage Early Marriages.

Pennsylvania is the latest state that is trying to encourage and regulate marriage by new methods. Representative Roth, of Lehigh, introduced a bill in the state legislature lately which provides that a male citizen of Pennsylvania over 40 years old making application for a marriage license shall pay to the clerk of courts a license fee of $100. This is to be turned into the state treasury for the purpose of maintaining homes for women over 40 years old who have not had a suitable opportunity or offer of marriage and have not means sufficient to keep themselves in clothes and spending money. Any bachelor over 40 years who shall go outside of the state for a wife shall pay $100 into the state treasury. The act is irrevocable and can never be repealed without the consent of the majority of the old women who have been regularly admitted to the homes established for them.—Chicago American.

It is well known that drink is one of the curses of Holland, and this queen's father and predecessor was a great drunkard. So great has been the young queen's influence that her husband, Henry Mecklenburg-Schwerin, who was well known to his army companions as a persistent drinker, has become a total abstainer. Many other members of the court have given up drinking habits. The queen never touches alcoholic liquor. While the most costly wines are always on the royal table on state occasions, neither the queen nor her mother ever allow their glasses to be filled. Those about the court have found out that the surest way to the queen's favor is to follow her example in the matter of total abstinence. If more of the crowned heads and those high and influential in public and social life would set such an example there would soon be a great decrease in drunkenness. We commend this as truly a royal example.

ALCOHOL AS A MEDICINE.

Experience Demonstrates That There Is No Excuse Whatever for Using It in That Capacity.

It is a very common thing even among strong temperance people to use wine or liquors for nearly every ailment; it is still considered a universal remedy for everything. How much of this idea is true we can learn from the words of a very prominent physician and temperance worker: "It is well that the human nature is so strong, that it can resist not only the sickness but also the alcohol."

In fact, there is at the present time no excuse whatever for using alcohol as a medicine. The physiological action of it is such that it not only does not help where it is intended to do so, but instead causes much harm; acting sometimes quite contrary from what it is expected. Especially is this the case when an alcoholic drink, whether warm or cold, is given for a cold or for any lung or throat trouble. As is well known, alcohol lowers the temperature of the body to such an extent that even the hot drink does no good. The very best thing for a cold is hot egg lemonade. Heat is needed and alcohol takes away the natural heat of the body.

It is about the same in stomach troubles. Alcohol burns the stomach and temporarily paralyzes the feeling of pain. But it also inflames the stomach, and thus causes a much worse trouble than the one it is hoped to cure.

Examples can be multiplied; it is just the same with everything. Alcohol is of no use as a medicine.

But, you ask, why do so many doctors prescribe liquors, wines and malt beverages for sick people? First, I will say, that the number of doctors doing so grows smaller every day. Further, that they do not prescribe them because they are convinced of their good effects, but simply because their patients want them.

A temperance man called a doctor to his sick wife. "She must have some port wine," said the doctor. "No," the man answered, "she is a temperance woman and will not take wine."

"That is the most sensible thing I have heard for a long time. Give her some unfermented grape juice, that is a hundred times better."

Every doctor who keeps up with the times would say the same thing, if he could give his honest opinion.

Only a few years ago most medicine was given in the form of strong alcoholic tinctures or extracts. Today the favorite form is a powder or a compressed tablet? Why? Because the alcohol did as much harm as the medicine did good.

Do we need more testimony?—B. F. Hockert, in International Good Templar.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS.

Temperance Sentiment Growing and Crystallizing Into Positive Action.

Notwithstanding there is much to discourage the temperance worker, and he seems to fight against a gigantic evil whose overthrow appears wellnigh impossible, still there are encouraging signs, rifts in the clouds through which the light occasionally breaks, revealing brighter things beyond. Temperance sentiment is growing and intensifying, and one of the certain signs of the times is that, with combinations in the financial, commercial and industrial world, there is coming the desire on the part of those holding decided views on economic, sociological or moral questions to stand together and unite forces in working out the particular problem demanding their attention.

It seems to one observer, at least, that the temperance people are the most backward in this particular, but slowly and surely are the division lines separating them being obliterated, and the temperance workers are coming into closer sympathy and touch than ever before.

Political, social and religious differences are being forgotten in the one purpose of successfully overthrowing the liquor curse. The churches of the land are the uncompromising foe of King Alcohol, and are the centers from which must radiate the power and sentiment that will accomplish his overthrow. The Catholic church is opposed to the liquor traffic, and is awakening to its responsibility towards this great question. The report from Dubuque, Ia., is that Archbishop Keane continues to insist vigorously that his parishioners get out of the saloon business, or at least that they conform to the laws by closing on Sunday and refusing to sell liquor to drunkards or minors. "If Catholic saloonkeepers continue to disobey," he said, "I shall be obliged to instruct my priests to refuse them the sacraments of the church."

At Wilkesbarre, Pa., has just occurred a most remarkable scene, the taking of the oath of total abstinence by an entire congregation of 1,168 persons. It was made the occasion of a most interesting and impressive service. Led by 100 white-gowned girls, each crowned with an evergreen wreath and marshaled by a dozen visiting priests, the entire congregation of the Holy Saviour Roman Catholic church of Wilkesbarre marched up the hill to the edifice at dusk and there took the pledge of total abstinence.

This act marked the culmination of the work of Rev. Father J. J. Curran, the pastor, who is president of the Catholic Temperance union, of the Scranton diocese. After the girls came the boys of the congregation, in uniform, and all carrying canes. Then came the men and women, all wearing uniform hats. With songs they marched into the church, and there, beginning with the girls, took the oath. It was administered by Father Curran to groups of 100, all that could stand in the space about the altar. Each and every one of 1,168 persons swore to neither taste, touch nor serve wine or spirituous liquor during his or her lifetime.

After the oath was taken by all there was a service of prayer and song and a sermon by Father O'Malley.

TEMPERANCE BREVITIES.

The board of police of Boston, Mass., announces that all liquor licenses must be paid for strictly in advance. It has been customary heretofore to grant extensions of time for payment.

About 3,000 intoxications in a lifetime is Dr. Charles L. Dana's estimate of the limit of man's endurance of alcohol. He finds that in 50 per cent. of the cases drunkards owe their condition to whisky and in 20 per cent. to beer.

Holland has her Carrie Nation in the person of Mrs. Waszklewicz Schiefgaarde, who makes perpetual but utterly vain war on the Dutch rum demon. She has announced her intention to visit England, where she means to start a crusade.

The village council of Cannon Falls, Minn., has passed an ordinance ordering all blinds and screens to be removed from saloons on Sundays. Selling liquors on Sunday is strictly prohibited, and public sentiment will sustain the council.

An Encouraging Sign.

It is always an encouraging sign when the pulpit arraigns the liquor traffic as one of the great evils of political and social life. We have a right to expect our clergy, Protestant and Catholic, to lead in the war of extermination against the greatest enemy of home and church. In a recent discourse, Archbishop Keane, of Dubuque, Ia., denounced the traffic in vigorous terms. He said he was ashamed to see so many Catholics engaged in this business of destroying men's souls, and earnestly appealed to them to abandon it. We trust the day is not far distant when from every pulpit in the land will come urgent appeals to all voters to abandon the system of legalizing and protecting the saloon business. Back of the saloonkeeper is the citizen who makes that avocation not only possible, but politically powerful.—Union Signal.

Prohibited His Own Beer.

Recently Guinness, the great "beer baron" of Dublin, erected some model tenements for the use of working people, and among other things prohibited all intoxicating liquors; even his own beer is not allowed to be sold. Lemonade and mineral waters can be had, but intoxicants of every form are shut out. Plenty of baths but no bars. Very significant.—National Temperance Advocate.

DEAF MUTES AT THE PLAY.

More of the Unfortunates Than Usual at the Theater During the Past Season.

"One curious phase of the theatrical business of the past season has been the number of deaf mutes in the audiences," said the head usher of a New York theater. "For several years a good many deaf mutes have been attending performances of panoramas, spectacular plays and highly spiced melodramas, but this year they seem to have declared themselves in favor of high art, and have patronized dramas that are short on action, but long on talk. Deaf mutes generally attend the theater in a party. We have had them come to our house in winter in squads of 20 or 30. Mute auditors of a play always buy good seats. Being deprived of enjoyment through one of their senses, they have to make up for the loss by catering to the sense of sight and they choose seats that give a clear view of the stage. Another thing noticeable about them is the enthusiasm with which they applaud.

"At first blush it might seem strange to see so many of the deaf and dumb flocking to the theater, but they are really but little worse off than the average American who goes to see a play in a foreign tongue. The American hears, but as he is unable to understand two words of the dialogue he has to depend upon his eyes for his knowledge of the action, so in that respect he and the mutes are quits."

Gold in the Carpets.

An order has gone out from the treasury department that before the various superintendents submit their reports for the current year they shall burn the rugs and carpets on the floors of the rooms where smelting and refining of gold and silver takes place. All the old cloths, gloves and other paraphernalia used in handling the precious metals are to be burned also and careful stock taken of the residue. The government expects to save anywhere from $50,000 to $100,000 from this process. It is customary to go through this formula every year or so and glean out all flakes of gold that may have been scraped or clipped off and lost to sight. Even the towels the employes wash their hands on are saved and submitted to fire.

SPECULATION IN 1901 CENTS.

They Will Easily Bring Nineteen Dollars in the Coin Market.

A flustering young woman, out of breath as though walking fast, rushed up the steps of the mint the other day, and asked to be directed to the bureau of information. "There isn't any," replied the uniformed messenger, a very fat man, reports the Philadelphia Record. "Perhaps I can tell you what you want to know." "Perhaps you can," said the young woman, producing a copy of a frivolous weekly paper. "I want to know if this is true." She pointed to a paragraph which read: "Among the curiosities of collecting is the fact that 1901 cents now bring about $19 in the coin market."

The fat messenger adjusted his glasses and scrutinized the paragraph. While he was thus engaged the young woman explained that she had four 1901 cents, and wanted to know what made them so valuable, and where she could realize on them. Then the fat messenger grew purple in the face from suppressed laughter, which finally exploded and seemed in momentary danger of having an apopleptic fit. He called the attention of the other messengers to the paragraph, and then followed combined roars of merriment. In the meantime the young woman with the four 1901 cents wondered if she had strayed by mistake into a lunatic asylum. Finally the fat messenger regained his breath sufficiently to gasp: "It's a joke. Don't you see? I'll give you $19 for 1,901 pennies, and I'll be a cent ahead of the game. See?" A great light seemed to dawn in the mind of the young woman. "I dare say it's very funny," she said, "but I don't think such things ought to be printed." And she made her exit sorrowfully.

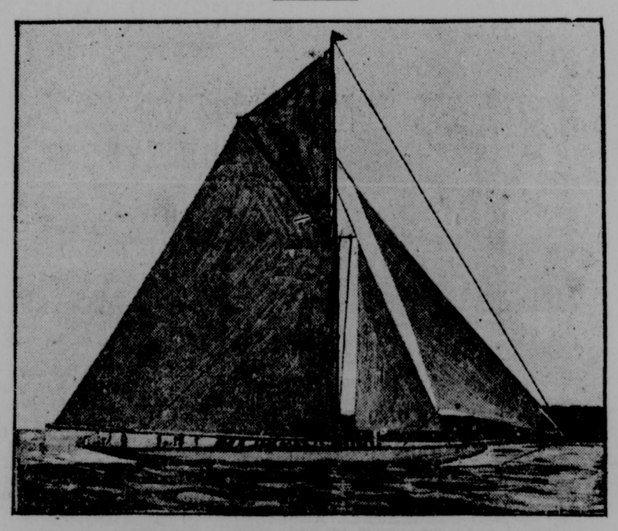
Seven Denominations in Wedding.

"The college roommate of a friend of mine was engaged to a lady in New York," writes Rev. D. M. Steele in his article on "Some People I Have Married," in Ladies' Home Journal. "His people are Congregationalists, but while at Yale he became a Unitarian. Her parents are Roman Catholics, but she was a member of the Ethical Culture society at Carnegie hall. In compliance with her mother's wish he asked five different priests to marry them, but all refused. In despair he came for me. I married them, an Episcopalian, with the ritual service in a Presbyterian chapel. The Roman Catholic brother of the bride and the Congregational sister of the groom were present. This sister acted as one witness; the other witness was a Jewess."

GEN. FREDERICK DENT GRANT, U. S. A.

After fighting in the Philippines for several years, Gen. Grant is enjoying a short holiday in the United States. His friends say that he presents a fine appearance physically, and his resemblance to his famous father, as that national hero's features are impressed in popular memory, is even greater than heretofore. He has talked freely with reporters concerning affairs in and around Manila, and is firm in the belief that the Filipinos will eventually make good Americans. In the general's district the natives celebrated Washington's birthday and are getting ready to have a glorious Fourth.

THE NEW SHAMROCK UNDER SAIL.



Sailormen declare with one accord that Sir Thomas Lipton's beautiful new cup defender is a hoodoo. In her first trial race she was beaten by Shamrock I. In her second she was badly damaged by wind and water, and nearly caused the death of King Edward of England, who was one of her passengers, as well as that of her owner and other persons of distinction. The yacht cannot be repaired in less than three months, and Sir Thomas has therefore requested the American committee to postpone the first cup race until September 21. The request has been granted.

DANGEROUS OCEAN ROADWAY.

Where Whales Are Frequently Run Into by Vessels Along the California Coast.

The coast of southern California is protected, to a certain extent, by the islands off shore. The group begins at Santa Barbara with San Miguel; then come Santa Rosa, Santa Cruz, Anacapa, and farther out to sea, 30 miles, San Nicolas. The next following south are Santa Barbara, Santa Catalina, San Clement, and then with a break of 70 miles the Coronadoes. These islands are almost parallel to the coast range and constitute virtually an out-to-sea coast range of mountains which, in all probability, were thrust up at the time the coast was formed, leaving a deep depression between them and the mainland, writes Charles Frederick Holder, in Scientific American.

This region of extremely deep water is a famous roadway for whales, several kinds being found here feeding upon the vast schools of jelly fishes which are nearly always present. The whale most common is the California gray, which goes every year to the shallows of the Gulf of California to give birth to its young, then moving north along the California coast in what is virtually a great procession. At this time the channel is the sporting ground for the huge animals, and nearly every steamer that crosses sights a school, the scene forming one of the attractions of the trip, as the whales, far from being wild or timid, sometimes evince a playful mood, or, incited by curiosity, come near the steamer, affording the passengers a near view of the largest of living animals.

This sociable disposition has resulted in several encounters between the whales and vessels in which the former have always come off second best. Some years ago a steamer on the trip from San Pedro to San Francisco struck some body, supposed at first to be a log. Several of the men were thrown to the deck; the wheel turned over so violently that the helmsman was also thrown down, and the steamer for the moment came to a standstill. All hands were called, the pumps sounded, and as the mate ran aft he saw a large whale lashing the water astern. The vessel had struck it directly back of the right paddle and evidently crushed it down, rising over it. This whale drifted into Santa Catalina some days later and was towed into one of the little bays of the coast where it was cut up by the fishermen.

During the summer of 1900 the steamer Hermosa killed a whale off San Pedro, which was at least 80 feet in length. The steamer was plowing along at a rate of 12 miles an hour, when suddenly a large whale rose directly in front of her, placing itself inadvertently across her bows, so that the blow was struck fairly. The shock created a sensation on board, and the blow was so violent that several people were thrown from their feet. It was supposed that the vessel had struck a sunken rock; she stopped for a few seconds, trembled, then rose about three feet, heeling slightly, then resumed her course, passing through a mass of blood which colored the water, showing that she had plunged into some large animal. A dead whale was sighted two days later, and for several days, on account of its size, it drifted up and down the coast with the tide, defying the efforts of speculative fishermen to secure it. Finally a heavy sea tossed it on the coast at the resort of Redondo, where it was hauled in at high tide, and when the latter went out left a marvelous spectacle of the remains of the largest of living animals. Hundreds of people visited the spot before it was dismembered. A long wound told the story of its contact with the steamer, that was wholly uninjured.

Doubtless if the records of shipping disasters were examined many instances would be found where vessels had crashed into whales with results fatal to the animal and more or less injurious to the vessel. In this connection a curious incident may be related regarding the actions of a school of whales at the island of Santa Rosa, Cal. The channel between this island is narrow and often extremely rough, and during a storm it was believed by those on the island that the whales became demoralized, as they deliberately ran ashore, and the remarkable sight of five or six large whales was observed helpless on the sands. Their bones remained for a long time on what became known as the whale's graveyard.

Ambiguous Abbreviations.

A British colonel repairing a railroad in South Africa discovered a fine empty house, which he proceeded to occupy as headquarters. When the news of the colonel's comfortable quarters reached Bloemfontein he received a telegram which read: "G. T. M. wants house." The colonel was unable to make out what "G. T. M." meant, and inquired of officers, who translated it "general traffic manager." "All right," said the colonel, "if he can use hieroglyphics, so can I." So he wired back: "G. T. M. can G. T. H." Summoned to Bloemfontein, he was asked what he meant by sending such an insulting message to a superior officer. "Insulting," replied the colonel, innocently; "it was nothing of the kind." "But what do you mean," demanded his superior, "by telling me I can 'G. T. H.?'" "It was simply an abbreviation," replied the colonel. 'G. T. M. (general traffic manager) can G. T. H. (get the house)."—London News.

THE UNITED STATES "IS."

Excellent Authority for the Use of the Singular Noun Given by Ex-Secretary of State.

Somebody recently criticised Gen. John W. Foster, the ex-secretary of state, because, all through his "Century of American Diplomacy," he treats "United States" as a singular noun, instead of as a plural one. This has moved the general to investigate that often mooted question with some care, and his conclusion is that, despite the wording of the constitution, there is full justification for saying "the United States is," and not "the United States are." He admits that in the early days of the republic, while the fact of it being an aggregation of sovereign states was still prominently in men's minds, the plural usage was the common one, but it was not universal, even in the beginning, and at one point in the constitution there is the phrase, "controversies to which the United States shall be a party," not "shall be parties," as strict consistency would require, says the New York Times.

Coming to precedents, Gen. Foster lists, among the statesmen who habitually employed the singular form Jefferson, Seward, Blaine, Edmunds, E. J. Phelps, Webster, Benton, Fish, Frelinghuysen, Motley, Reid, Gresham, Silas Wright, Marcy, Evarts, Bayard, C. F. Adams, Depew and Olney—certainly a long and varied category. In the earlier presidential messages the plural form prevails, but Andrew Jackson used the other, and his example, in this matter at least, has been followed by his successors, and since Lincoln all of them have invariably used the singular verb with "United States." And the general wants to know why, if we must write "the United States are," simply because the constitution has it that way, we are not also obliged to write "chuse," instead of "choose," and to retain other orthographical peculiarities which appear in the precious old document. This is hardly a fair question, since the use of "is" or "are" after "United States" involves something very different from mere spelling. Gen. Foster's usage, however, is undoubtedly that of 999 out of 1,000 American citizens of the present day, and what more or higher warrant for it does he need than that, particularly as the facts and the fashion are in completed accord?

Law to Encourage Early Marriages.

Pennsylvania is the latest state that is trying to encourage and regulate marriage by new methods. Representative Roth, of Lehigh, introduced a bill in the state legislature lately which provides that a male citizen of Pennsylvania over 40 years old making application for a marriage license shall pay to the clerk of courts a license fee of $100. This is to be turned into the state treasury for the purpose of maintaining homes for women over 40 years old who have not had a suitable opportunity or offer of marriage and have not means sufficient to keep themselves in clothes and spending money. Any bachelor over 40 years who shall go outside of the state for a wife shall pay $100 into the state treasury. The act is irrevocable and can never be repealed without the consent of the majority of the old women who have been regularly admitted to the homes established for them.—Chicago American.

WHILE HE WAITED.

The clock upon the mantel stands;
It ticks, and so I know it's going,
But as to speed its gilded hands
Don't make a very rapid showing.

My lady's maid an age ago
Said she would be down in a second;
I'd give a trifle just to know
Exactly how her time is reckoned!

The thing is pretty of its kind;
Two chubby loves support its dial.
One love, a strong one, though, I find,
Supports me in this present trial.

Perhaps by her fair hand 'tis wound;
I wonder this the while I linger.
My lady can—that, too, I've found—
Wind me—around her little finger.

She knows it, too; I'll bet a dime
Her purpose is to keep me guessing.
It seems I'm only marking time,
Whereas I thought I was progressing.

Time! That is why this clock is set—
To mind us of the moments fleeting,
But time completely I forget
From the sweet moment of our meeting.

Tick, tick, the tiny pendulum;
Click, click, her boot heels, oak and leather;
Thump, thump, my heart! I knew she'd come—
All three now keeping time together.

A Cure For Loneliness

BY W. R. ROSE

The air was mild and clear. The children frolicked merrily among the trees in the park. The white capped nurses sat on the rustic seats here and there and watched their charges or played with the smaller children who nestled in wicker carriages with gay colored canopies.

On one of the benches not far from the entrance sat an elderly man. He was straight and square shouldered, with a white mustache and grizzled hair and a strong suggestion of early military training. He sat there because he liked to see the children at play. They were better company than his thoughts. Anyway, he had little else to do.

On this particular day he had watched the playful elves as they darted in and out among the trees until he had grown tired. The warm sun made him sleepy. His gray head slowly dropped back, his shoulders found a restful corner of the high backed seat, and presently he was soundly sleeping.

A slight concussion awakened him. He opened his eyes with a little start. The sun was peeping through the foliage, and the rays dazzled him. He tried to raise a hand to draw his soft hat over his eyes and could not. Both hands were pinioned fast. He looked down. A rope was encircling his body and holding his arms fast to his sides. He made an effort to release himself, but without success. He fancied he could sympathize with the feelings of Gulliver when he found the pygmies had caught and bound him. He was sure it was one of the playful fairies whom he had watched so many times among the trees. He was right. A child's laughter broke on his ears. His captor was close behind him.

"Aha," he said in what was intended for a very gruff voice, "are you there? Unhand me at once or tremble for the consequences!"

The cord—it was a child's skipping rope—was rapidly drawn from about his waist, and a moment later its owner danced in front of him.

She was a little girl of possibly 7, though at times her varying expressions made her seem much older. Her hair floated about her head in careless waves and tendrils, her eyes were gray and deep, her mouth was small and beautifully shaped, and there was a saucy upward tilt to her short nose.

"Pooh, pooh," she said, with a mocking courtesy, "I ain't a bit afraid of you!"

"And why not?" the old man asked. She was a charming fairy, a naturel little coquette, and her every move was full of a subtle grace. "And why are you not afraid of such a gray old mustache as I am?" he asked again as she pirouetted before him.

"Because you are my grandfather," she carelessly answered.

The old man's face darkened.

"What do you mean by that nonsense?" he harshly asked.

"'Tain't nonsense," said the little maiden, "unless grandfathers is nonsense. Anyway, you're my grandfather." And she started to leave him.

"Wait," he cried. "Come here. What did you mean by saying I am your grandfather? Do you call every old man you see grandfather?"

"No," said the child. "Only you."

He studied her face sharply.

"Come a little closer," he said in coaxing tones. She marched boldly up to him. Her little hand flew up and touched the front of her cap.

"That's the way to salute a soldier," she said, with a merry laugh. "Mamma said you was one."

He caught his breath.

"Perhaps," he slowly said, "you can even tell me my name?"

"Yes, I can," replied the child. "It's easy. Your name is Philip. An now guess what mine is."

"Is—is it Mary?" he gently asked.

"No," laughed the child. "That's mamma's. Mine is most like yours. It's Philippa."

The old man was silent for a moment.

"Is your mother here, child?" he suddenly asked. "Is she lurking about among the trees?"

"Who? Do you mean mamma?" cried the child. "She isn't here. She hasn't no time for trees. She's always too busy. Didn't you know she paints? Yes; she paints lovely little pictures. Minichoors she calls them. They're pictures of people, don't you know, only much prettier. But sometimes people don't pay very quick, an sometimes they think mamma charges too much, an sometimes she doesn't have any pictures to do. Then, you know, it's pretty hard to have the landlord call. I guess you know how that is."

"And where is your father?" and the old man's voice suddenly grew hard.

"He's deaded in Callyforny," said the child. "He was an actor, you know; a stage actor. I don't 'member him very well. I was too little when he went away. I've tried to act, too, but Delia, that's the janitor's wife, she says I can't act for shucks."

"Good thing," muttered the old man.

"Well, I don't know," said the child. "You see, I wanted to do somethin to help mamma, an if I can't act I don't know what I can do. But I s'pose it's no use. Delia said that as a child wonder I was the wust she ever seen, an Delia goes out a good deal."

A faint smile crossed the old man's stern features.

"And what made you think that I am your grandfather?" he asked.

"Oh, Marie Kramer told me!" replied the child. "She knows everybody. She's lived out more places. She's Bessie Leighton's nurse now, an just as soon as she saw you sittin here one day she said, 'There's old Colonel Robson.' She knew you 'cause you used to go to the Bronsons, where she was livin then. An pretty soon she looked at me an said, 'Why, he's your grandfather, ain't he?' An I said I didn't know, an she thought it out an said, 'Yes, he is, 'cause your mamma is his daughter, an she ran away with a play actor, an the old hunks shut his door on her forever.' That's what Marie said. An when I went home I said to Delia, 'My grandfather's sittin over there in the park, an he's the lonesomest lookin thing.' An Delia says: 'If he's settin in the park, he's either a tramp or a millunaire. If he's a tramp, you must keep away from him, but if he's a millunaire you want to rope him in.' An when I looked at you again I saw you didn't look like a tramp, an so I thought I'd take my chances an rope you in, an that's just what I did."

"And your mother knows nothing about my being here?" the old man asked.

"Yes, she does," replied the child. "I told her, an she looked so queer, an her face got red, an she said: 'Philippa, dear, it may not be your grandfather. But anyway you mustn't speak to him unless he speaks to you first.' An I made you speak to me first, didn't I?"

The old man leaned back and looked at the child.

"Philippa," he said slowly, "how would you like to come and live with me? You would have your own beautiful room, and all the playthings you could want, and somebody to wait on you, and a pony to drive, and everything that could make a little girl happy."

"An would mamma come, too?" the child asked.

The old man shook his head.

"I'd like the room," said the child, "an the pony an all the rest, but I guess I'd be too lonesome without mamma."

"But you'd have me," urged the old man.

"We'd be just two lonesome ones together," said the child. Then she added, "If you knew mamma, you'd see how it is."

"Perhaps I am beginning to see," said the old man softly.

"I'll tell you what we'll do," cried the child. "You can borrow me. How's that?"

"It sounds well," said the old man. "How must I set about it?"

"Oh, it's easy," replied the child. "You just come to our flat an send up your card, an then mamma will whistle down an say, 'Please come up.' Then you go up, an I'm there, an I say, 'Mr. Grandpapa, this is mamma.' Then you bow an say, 'Pleased to know you,' an mamma says, 'Where have I seen you before?' an then you say, 'Can I borrow your charmin daughter for the rest of the day?' for you've come very early in the mornin, you know, an mamma says, 'Have you any s'curity for the rent—I mean for the child?' an you say, 'Oh, yes; indeed I have,' an then you put up a silver quarter for s'curity an take me, an we go away somewhere an have a splendid time together an get home when it's real dark, an mamma is gettin fidgety. I'd like to see that house of yours an that room an those ponies. We ought to get better acquainted—we ought to, really."

The old man smiled at her enthusiasm. Evidently this was a delightfully original child.

"Do you think your mamma would paint my portrait?" he asked.

"She'd be real pleased to," said the child. "An I'd get the commission, too, wouldn't I? She told me if I got any orders I'd get the commission. You're my order, ain't you?"

"Yes," said the old man as he slowly arose. "Come, we will go and seek your mother. I must get that picture before I grow any older—and before your mamma's memory quite outgrows the reminiscences of her childhood. Come, Philippa."

And hand in hand they passed down the graveled walk and through the big gates and presently found themselves in front of the huge apartment house that the lonesome Philippa called home.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Too Hungry to Study.

A certain teacher who had studied a particular bad boy from every conceivable standpoint finally found the cause of his apparent wickedness. He had been especially annoying all day, and at the close of the school the teacher sat down by him and said: "John, what is the trouble, anyway? Why is it you find it so hard to behave in school?"

Poor John, in a burst of confidence, blurted out, "It's cos I'm so derned hungry!"

Then the teacher knew that John's reformation must begin in his stomach. —Exchange.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 25. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JUNE 27, 1901. NUMBER 16.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Plans of the Bureau Outlined For the Season of 1901.

Prof. William Bullock Clark, the State Geologist, reports having made his assignments for the summer in the State of Maryland and the work expected to be accomplished as follows:

Work will be continued in Western Maryland this season chiefly in Garrett county, which was nearly completed last season. Dr. G. C. Martin will have charge of the work here and will devote his attention to the study of the carboniferous formations. He will carefully measure and locate those coal seams which have not been hitherto mapped. Associated with Dr. Martin in this work is Mr. N. Allen Stockton, who has undertaken the important task of preparing for the coal report which will be later issued—a chapter on the mining of coal in Maryland.

Messrs. Penniman and Brown, the well-known analytical chemists of Baltimore, have been engaged for some time in making both chemical and calorimetric tests of the coal collected at various points. The Maryland Geological Survey, purchased some time since a calorimeter of most modern design which gives much more accurately than a chemical test the steam producing values of the coal treated. The great work entailed in making these tests does not make it possible to analyze the coal upon every property, but typical specimens are selected from various points from each vein, and these comparative tests will be later published in the report on coal.

The work of the highway division, which is under the direction of Dr. H. F. Reid, is rapidly increasing in importance. Mr. A. N. Johnson, the highway engineer, and his associate, Mr. J. Morrison Harris, are almost daily in the field in connection with the improvements which are going on in Harford, Frederick, Prince Georges Howard and other counties. They are in close touch with the boards of county commissioners and the road supervisors, who are coming to recognize the important aid this bureau can render to the highway interests of the State. Messrs. Johnson and Harris have just completed an elaborate survey for the improvement of some miles of highway in Harford county under the provision of the Woolsey fund. They have prepared complete specifications under which the contracts are to be let, and, at the request of the Harford county authorities, will supervise the construction of the highway.

The highway division is also engaged in making tests upon the materials used on the city streets. It has been called on by the authorities of Baltimore, Cumberland and Annapolis in connection with this work. The survey laboratory is fitted with the necessary apparatus for testing vitrified brick and macadam materials. The City Engineer's department of Baltimore city today submits all of this material, before contracts are let, to the highway division, and the city is in this way fully protected in its purchases, since the tests employed show at once the relative wearing and breaking qualities of the materials submitted. Most of our progressive municipalities as well as foreign cities recognize the great importance of the tests employed in determining the value of materials submitted by contractors.

The highway division has recently established a machine for the determining of the value of cements used in public works. There are great opportunities for deception in the sale of this material, but when tested with the apparatus recently constructed the relative values of the materials submitted are immediately shown.

Forestry work will be completed the present season, in co-operation with the Bureau of Forestry of the United States Department of Agriculture, in Cecil, Calvert, St. Mary's and Garrett counties and reports prepared to accompany the volume and folios relating to these counties. The platting of the geological soils already completed for Garrett, Allegany, St. Mary's, Calvert, Kent and Cecil counties will be continued the present season in Prince George's and Harford counties in co-operation with the Bureau of Soils, United States Department of Agriculture. The hydrographic work is also being continued in co-operation with the United States Geological Survey and the faunal and floral studies in co-operation with the Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture.

The study of the magnetic variation in Maryland, which has been successfully prosecuted under the direction of Dr. L. A. Bauer since the organization of the Survey, is successfully continued in co-operation with the new Division of Terrestrial Magnetism of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, of which Dr. Bauer has been made the head. The few counties which had not been thoroughly surveyed and mapped have been examined during the past year and Dr. Bauer is now engaged on his second report on the terrestrial magnetism of the State, which will be of the very greatest value to the county surveyors in the determination of property lines under the original grants.

The topographic work, which has been vigorously pursued by the Maryland Geological Survey in co-operation with the United States Geological Survey since the organization of the State bureau, in order to prepare a suitable base map on which the scientific work along all lines might be platted, has already resulted in the complete survey of Allegany, Garrett, Cecil, Harford, Kent, Worcester, Somerset, St. Mary's, Calvert and Prince George's counties, while portions of many of the adjacent counties have already been surveyed. The work this season will not be taken up until later in the year and will then be confined to the preparation of the map of Baltimore county. Less work is being done this season along topographic lines since maps are available for the other lines of work, as it is the desire of the State Geologist to publish as rapidly as possible the reports of the counties already completed. Manuscripts for the reports on Garrett, Cecil, St. Mary's and Prince George's counties are already well advanced, and part or all of these reports will be ready for the press, together with their accompanying folios of maps in the autumn.

Maryland at Buffalo.

It is said that the mineral and other exhibits at the Buffalo Exposition prepared and arranged by the Maryland Geological Commission constitute the most striking exhibition that Maryland has ever made at any of the great fairs. Many Marylanders who go there will no doubt be surprised at this evidence of the wealth and resources of the State. The position occupied by Maryland in the Building of Mines and Mining is conspicuous and at once attracts attention. The Maryland commission has caused the preparation of a pamphlet of about forty pages descriptive of the State, which will be distributed at the fair. The little book is prepared by the Maryland Geological Survey and is well printed and profusely illustrated with views of Maryland scenery and industries. It gives a brief historical sketch of the State, population of counties and towns, areas, resources, accounts of various industries, facilities for transportation, fisheries, soil, climate and a great deal of other information which is accurate as well as intesesting. It also contains a map of the State showing in red letters the industries and products of each county, giving to a man seeking a home the information he wants at a quick glance.—Baltimore Sun.

Snake Ate the Squirrel.

The following snake story appears in J. Slidell Brown's paper. When a fellow gets to seeing six foot snakes he should either swear off or change the brand:

"Mr. Hez Miller was in town one day last week and told us about killing the first and largest rattlesnake of the season. He found his snakeship sunning himself on the pike between his farm and Tunnelton while driving to town, and killed it. It measured six feet and four inches long and was nearly five inches in diameter at the largest part. It wore a string of nineteen rattles, which Mr. Miller showed us as proof of the truth of his story. The snake was very stupid and appeared to have lately devoured a very hearty meal; so Mr. Miller performed a surgical operation on him to see what rattlesnakes were feeding on this spring, and found a full grown black squirrel. The squirrel was not quite dead so he took it home and gave it a small dose of apple jack and sweet milk, which soon brought him around all right. Mr. Miller says the little fellow is very tame and seems grateful for his timely rescue. He has the squirrel in a cage at his home for any one to see who may doubt the truth of the story, and is going to have the skin of the reptile stuffed."

Money to Loan.

$4,000 to loan on first mortgage in n sums to suit upon town property or nearby farms.

EDWARD H. SINCELL.

CORKSCREW PHILOSOPHY.

The road to hell is never far from a church.

The devil aims to make things convenient for his followers.

Christian Science and sanctification are on the same footing, both profess to be more than mortal.

No belief is too improbable to find fanatical adherents—on the contrary, the more unreasonable the belief the more unyielding are its followers.

The devil, the doctors and the D. D's. are about the only ones that can do as they please—and they are all united to rob man of his ease.

Softening of the brain usually follows hardening of the heart. If you would keep a sane mind you must keep a fresh heart—a warm heart for your fellow man and his needs.

Private mad houses are badges of social distinction. The majority of the inmates are rich men crazed with an unholy desire to gain great wealth, and now fear that they will die in poverty.

Oh, blessed joy of wealth! Oh, radiant bliss of fine clothes! The lilies of the valley are not in it and the glory of Solomon but a by-word in the domain of the four hundred!

Elizabeth Cady Stanton gravely suggests that men pass a law compelling women to insert pockets in their dresses—and yet Mrs. Stanton advocates female suffrage.

Eve persuaded herself that the apple was good to eat, and lied to the devil when she had made up her mind to eat it. Womankind has been hankering after strange apples ever since, and are as ready and willing—as was Eve—to eat them.

JACKSON.

FRIENDSVILLE.

F. G. Fox, of this place, met with a very painful accident on last Tuesday. While engaged in ripping lumber in his planing mill his hand came in contact with the saw, cutting it so badly that it was necessary to amputate his thumb and all the fingers on his right hand. We are glad to state that he is getting along nicely.

Politics are getting warm in District No. 2. We noticed that on last Friday morning the Hon. A. F. George, of Swanton, who is a candidate for State Senator, arrived at Friendsville and was met at the station by Mr. W. D. Collier and escorted to the Collier Hotel, where he breakfasted. From there he visited some of the nearby lumber camps and left on the noon train, but before going he told his political friends that Mr. J. S. Meyers had promised to deliver him the district in the convention.

We are pleased to learn that Prof. G. B. Frazee has been employed to teach our school the coming winter. We understand the School Board is contemplating the remodeling of our school house, which is certainly a very great necessity.

Married.

Mr. B. Webb Browning, a former resident of Garrett county, and Miss Mattie Eleanor Allen, of Washington, D. C., were married at the home of the bride yesterday. The happy pair will reside in Roanoke, Va., where the groom holds a responsible position with the Norfolk and Western railroad company. The groom is a great grandson of the famous pioneer hunter, Meshack Browning, of Garrett county.

Mr. Paul A. Schultz, of Blaine, W. Va., and Miss Jennie Browning, daughter of William Browning, Esq., of near Oakland, were married yesterday at the bride's home by Rev. George I. Uhler, of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church. Mr. Schultz is a young man of sterling worth. His bride formerly taught school in this county and is held in high esteem.

Fourth of July.

The W. Va. C. & P. Ry. will sell excursion tickets between stations on its line July 3rd and 4th, good for returning until July 5, 1901, inclusive, at regular excursion rates.

CANDIDATES GALORE.

The Republicans at the Convention Next Week Will Find No Dearth of Material

WITH WHICH TO FILL THE TICKET.

All Who Have Been Named for the Various Offices Are Good Men and the Ticket Will Be Composed of Representative Citizens.

At the Republican County Convention which is to meet in the opera house here next week the representatives of the party who will be present as delegates from the various districts composing the county will have no difficulty in finding candidates for the several places on the ticket. The offices to be filled number nine, whilst the number of candidates in the field, so far as known at least, number no less than thirty-one.

Whatever else can be said nearly every person who has so far been spoken of in connection with the ticket to be nominated has numerous warm and staunch friends who will stand by them in the convention and put up a stiff fight for them with the hope of landing the nomination. Some of the gentlemen whose names appear below have announced themselves openly, whilst others are being put forward by their friends.

Beginning with district No. 1 the Republicans have as candidates the following: Hon A. F. George, State Senator; L. H. Friend, Sheriff.

District No. 2—Jacob S. Myers, State Senator; Edward J. Frantz, Sheriff; Messrs. Taylor Friend, John T. Geary and Andrew J. Fike, County Commissioners; Nathan L. Selby, D. K. Herring and J. George Kolb, members of the House of Delegates.

District No. 3—In this district a number of gentlemen have been spoken of in connection with the several places on the ticket notably the Legislative portion of it. So far as learned, however, no one is an avowed candidate.

District No. 4—Dr. H. M. Kemp has been mentioned as a possibility in connection with the House of Delegates; Henry Barnard, Esq., is favorably spoken of as a candidate for County Commissioner.

District No. 5—The present State Senator, Dr. R. A. Ravenscroft, will no doubt have his home district without opposition. County Treasurer Lohr is again a candidate for the office.

District No. 6—The situation in Sang Run is badly mixed and it would require the services of a score of Philadelphia lawyers to straighten out the tangles. W. A. Maffett is a candidate for Sheriff; Ezra B. Hauger and Nimrod Glotfelty want to be County Commissioners, while Merchant E. A. Weimer is out for the House of Delegates.

District No. 7—Capt. James A. Hayden is making it interesting in his district for Senatorial honors; Andrew Shartzer will accept the Sheriffalty, and Edwin E. Friend would like to be Register of Wills.

District No. 8—Capt. James W. White is a candidate for State Senator. Opposing him is Elliott C. Harvey for House of Delegates. George W. Ward, Register of Wills.

District No. 9—Hon. Patrick E. Finzel is having no opposition in his district for the nomination as a member of the House of Delegates. He has already served one term and also at the extra session and has a good record.

District No. 10—William H. Junkins, Esq., for Sheriff, and E. W. Kelso, Esq., will accept renomination for the position he now holds, County Commissioner. The office has been filled exceptionally well by him.

District No. 11—County Surveyor Franklin P. Green is the only candidate who will be put forward.

District No. 12—No candidates.

District No. 13—No candidates.

District No. 14—Mr. Chas. A. Ashby, a member of the oldest and the pioneer family of this section of the State, comes before the people as a candidate for the House of Delegates. He is opposed by Attorney Julius C. Renninger. Mr. James W. White is a candidate for County Treasurer.

This, we believe, completes the list of those aspiring for office. The fight to control delegations, so far at least, with but one or two exceptions, has been carried on in a friendly way. The primaries on Saturday will effectually settle the matter.

Fourth of July Picnic.

A picnic and dance will be held at the North Glade club house on July 4th. Mr. E. K. Browning, of Swanton, will be in charge of the affair. Refreshments will be served to all.

BLOOMINGTON.

Col. T. B. Davis, of Keyser, and Mr. John Brydon, superintendent of the Thomas and Coketon plants, were entertained at Borderside by Mrs. W. H. Brydon on last Monday.

Mr. Junkins, of Deer Park, was in town one day last week in the interest of his candidacy for sheriff. We hear a good many Republicans speak kindly of Mr. Junkins. Evidently he made a good impression.

The remains of Miss Anna Ambrose, who died about a year ago at the home of her parents, Capt. and Mrs. N. M. Ambrose, Washington, D. C., arrived in town Tuesday morning and were buried in the family lot in the Bloomington graveyard. The body was accompanied by her father, her sister, Miss Nellie Ambrose, and D. Kalbaugh, a relative of the family.

Mr. John Herman, a well known German citizen of District No. 1, passed through town on Tuesday.

Mrs. Simpson, accompanied by her daughter and son-in-law and their family, will start next Thursday on a visit to relatives in and near Winchester, Va.

Hon. George L. Michaels, an influential citizen and one of the most progressing farmers of the Firm Rock neighborhood, was in town on business last Monday. Mr. Michaels is one of the oldest Republicans in this district and is well and favorably known all over the county. He is not a chronic office seeker, but we know of no one mentioned for a place on the ticket this fall that could represent the people with better ability than Mr. Michaels.

The body of John Williams, who was drowned last Monday noon, while fording the Potomac river a short distance below the B. & O. bridge, was found on the Thursday following in the dam at W. Va. Junction. The remains were taken to the undertaking establishment of Messrs. Bolden & Brown, of Piedmont, where they were prepared for burial. The funeral occurred at Lonaconing from the residence of relatives and was attended by a great crowd of friends relatives.

Dr. Kemp, of this place, assisted by Dr. Shuey, and Dr. Shupe, of Washington, operated on Mr. Gilbert Warnick at his home last Sunday morning for appendicitis. At this writing we understand Mr. Warnick's condition is considered very satisfactory.

Miss Fannie Elliott is spending a few days with relatives on the Judge Barnard's farm.

Mr. Earle Ambrose, an attorney of Washington, D. C., was in town last week.

The interest in the outcome of the struggle between Ravenscroft and George in their race for the nomination of State Senator is about neck and neck. Candidly speaking, however, the Republicans of this district are not very enthusiastic about either one of them and would rather welcome a general upheaval that would bring a new candidate out for the place and send these two back into the ranks of the workers. Some claim that these gentlemen have feasted long enough at the political table and they should be charitable and generous enough to vacate their places and let some one else go through the fattening process.

Of course politics make strange bed fellows and our rivals in the field often have remarkable memories of things past and gone and oftentimes compel one to spend more than one sleepless night in tucking some disagreeable guest under the covers. If straws show the direction of the wind and George's craft is well managed the breeze is strong enough to send him across the line a winner.

HIS LIFE SAVED

By Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy.

"I am sure that Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy at one time saved my life," says A. E. Lafalette, of Gregory Landing, Clark county, Missouri. "I was in such bad shape that the doctors said I could not live. When I was at the lowest ebb, one of my neighbors brought in a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy and I took it and got instant relief. I soon got up and around. That was nine years ago and I am still in good health. Since then that medicine has always been in my house and always will be. It is the best on earth." For sale by all dealers.

Schedule Again Changed.

The postoffice department has issued orders to the star router between Oakland and Accident annulling the recent order changing the hours for leaving Oakland and Accident, which was to go into effect Monday next. The present order, mail to leave Accident in the morning, will remain in force.

DEER PARK.

Mr. and Mrs. Amos Jeffers, of Terra Alta, have been visiting their daughter, Mrs. J. F. Taylor.

B. F. Laughlin and sister, Miss Sada, are visiting relatives in Waynesburg, Va.

Hon. A. F. George was in town Saturday.

Miss Florence Forman, of Terra Alta, is the guest of her sister, Mrs. W. C. Jones.

Miss Katie Griffin spent Friday with Oakland friends.

Miss Georgia Hoye and Miss Josephine Hoye, of Mt. Lake Park, were in town Sunday.

Mrs. W. A. Bowen, of Altamont, spent Tuesday with her sister, Mrs. F. N. Reis.

Messrs. J. L. Fitzwater, and J. A. Fitzwater, of Beckman, were in town Tuesday.

H. A. Lohm, of Grafton, is visiting his parents, Mr. and Mrs. L. Lohm.

The Epworth League will hold a lawn fete in the grove opposite the M. E. church, Fourth of July evening.

The Junior Epworth League will hold a lawn fete in the grove next Saturday evening, June 27th. Strawberries, ice cream, cake and other refreshments will be for sale. The proceeds will be for the benefit of the league. Everybody come and bring everybody else and spend a pleasant evening with the little folks. If the weather is unfavorable the affair will be held in Laughlin's hall.

To Take Off Two Trains.

The Parkersburg Journal says:

"The Baltimore and Ohio railroad company has decided to take off two of its through trains that traverse this division. One of them is No. 12, which arrives here each afternoon at 3.15 o'clock on its way to the east, and the other is No. 1, which arrives after 3 a. m. each day from the east bound for St. Louis. Those two trains will be taken off entirely and no new trains will be substituted in their places, although the time of other trains will very likely be changed, as the result of the taking off of these two trains.

"Definite orders have not yet been received by the local officials of the company, but their arrival is expected almost hourly, now."

Train No. 1 is due in Oakland at 10.07 p. m., and No 12, main line, at 8.35 p. m.

A Good Cough Medicine.

It speaks well for Chamberlain's Cough Remedy when druggists use it in their own families in preference to any other. "I have sold Chamberlain's Cough Remedy for the past five years with complete satisfaction to myself and customers," says Druggist J. Goldsmith, Van Etten, N. Y. "I have always used it in my own family both for ordinary coughs and colds and for the cough following la grippe, and find it very efficacious." For sale by all dealers.

"Tarry Thou Till I Come."

"The Wandering Jew" is having a wonderful revival in literature lately. The first book in this fascinating field was "Salathiel," by Geo. Croly, "Christ's words to whom," "Tarry thou till I come," spoken beneath the weight of the cross to the scoffing Pharisee, sets the Jew wandering. Most notable followers of this story were Eugene Sue's masterpiece, and "The Prince of India," by the author of "Ben Hur." General Wallace himself praises Croly's "Salathiel" as one of the six greatest English novels ever written. One New York publisher has lately issued an illustrated edition at $1.40 net. Now comes John B. Alden, so well known as the pioneer in cheap book publishing, with an excellent edition at 25 cents; even this, with a view to widely extending the knowledge of his publications, he offers to mail postpaid to the readers of THE REPUBLICAN for the nominal price of 12c., if they will order at once, and mention the paper. Doubtless, many will accept his offer. Address John B. Alden, Publisher, 442 Peral St., New York.

Adjutant General Corbin and Party Pass Through.

Adjutant General Corbin, U. S. A., accompanied by Lieut. Col. John A. Johnston of the adjutant general's department and M. G. Seckendorff, of the New York Tribune, passed through this city last Thursday afternoon in a private car attached to B. & O. passenger train No. 55, being enroute to the Philippines to make a personal inspection of military conditions and needs for the personal information and guidance of the President and secretary of war.

A Sinner Unrepentant

By Sophie Gates Kerr.

(Copyrighted by the Ladies' World. Reprinted by Permission.)

"MY, BUT your mornin' glories do look nice, Miss Phemey! Wish you'd save me some seed offen that white one." It was Mrs. Ridley coming up the walk.

"I will, Mis' Ridley. Come in and set down. There's a pa'm leaf on the lounge, an' mebbe you'll take a glass of cool water. It's a scorchin' mornin'," said Miss Phemey.

"I would like a drink, thank you," responded Mrs. Ridley. "Seems like when anybody's fat as I am, they just get het up like a coal stove. My, that tastes good. You got a grand well, Miss Phemey."

The hostess smiled a flattered smile, but before she could speak Mrs. Ridley went on: "I brought over three of Mr. Ridley's vests, Miss Phemey, to get you to mend 'em. He's bu'sted 'em ever' one right down the back, f'r all the world like a seven-year locust, I tell 'im, an't seems like I got no time to fix 'em, with Emma May gittin' married next week. We're just livin' in a regular whirlwind, an' sorry as I'll be to see Emma May go—not that I don't like Charlie Foote, but you know what I mean—I cert'ney shall be glad when all this fuss is over."

"I expect it is trying," sympathized Miss Phemey. "But Emma May's always been a good daughter, an' she deserves a fine weddin'."

"'Tain't that I don't want her to have it," said Mrs. Ridley, hastily. "But I'm just dog-tired this mornin'—for the land sakes, it's half-past ten o'clock already; I got to go. You bring them vests over when they're done, Miss Phemey, an' I'll pay you f'r 'em. I'd send one o' the boys over, but Emma May wants you to come perTickler an' see her presents, so'll be killin' two birds with one stone." She chuckled comfortably as she stepped outside the door.

Miss Phemey looked after her departing form with resentful stare. "Yes," she muttered, "she can get Miss Maxwell to make Emma May's weddin' clothes, but I'm good enough to mend up Jim Ridley's old vests. I'll charge her 15 cents apiece, see 'f I don't; that'll be 45 cents. Does seem a good bit to charge f'r mendin' three vests."

"Emma May wants you to come perTickler to see her presents! 'Tain't no hint; oh, no! Sally Ridley needn't 'a'troubled herself to say that. I got a present for Emma May, an' I'm going to give it to her. I'd like to get even with them, the whole kid band of 'em. Jest as if I couldn't 'a'made Emma May's weddin' clo's! They tell me Miss Maxwell uses a chain-stitch machine. I always did say chain-stitch machines was made for the careless, an' I don't see no reason to change my mind. Well, 'pon word, this vest ain't on'y bu'sted, but frayed int' the bargain." Miss Phemey fell briskly to sewing.

The next day, despite the threatening rumble of a distant storm, Miss Phemey dressed in her best and started toward the Ridleys, carefully carrying two packages. She was graciously received by Emma May, a fat, fair girl of pleasant mien and placid disposition.

"I brought home them vests," explained Miss Phemey; "and here, Emma May, is a little present I brought for you. It'll be nice f'r your dining-room table, I thought." She held out a small white pasteboard box, with an expression of the heaping-coals-of-fire kind.

"Ma," called Emma May, "come here; Miss Phemey's brought me a butter knife! Wisht you'd look! That cert'ney is beautiful."

"It's solid silver," said the donor, proudly. "My niece down to New York got it for me." She received the thanks, delivered a trifle embarrassedly, of mother and daughter, with polite coolness.

When the bride-elect invited her to an inspection of the presents, Miss Phemey looked them over and made few comments. She turned the set of silver spoons, "presented by the groom's parents," so that the plate-mark was visible, and she tapped the globe of a gaudy china lamp with the remark that they were just two dollars and thirty-nine cents down to Beedham's. When she had looked at all, she said, cheerfully:

"Now I want to see your clothes, Emma May."

Mr. and Mrs. Ridley exchanged glances of annoyance, but the latter led the way to the spare room, where, on bed and chair, lay the creations of Miss Maxwell, "City Modiste."

There was the white silk wedding dress, the tan traveling dress, some odd waists, a black satin, stiff with jet, and a "tea gown." No girl in a country town marries without these last indispensable garments; they are the real backbone of the trousseau.

Miss Phemey looked at the display, felt the quality of the material, and examined the despised chain-stitching, without a word. At last she said, pleasantly conscious of paying old scores:

"If I might persoom to criticise, I really do think it's a pity you got your wedding dress made with a p'inted overskirt. All the latest fashion books say they're not worn at all this season; and box plaits, too, is kind of dropping out. I was readin' only yesterday that 'twas just the cheapest goods was made up so any more. That black satin's real pretty, though. Did you see Lena Sullivan's black satin? Hers was a beauty—finest piece o' satin I ever cut into, an' all made up with these plaited ruffles. Why, Emma May, seems if you'd be most afraid to leave all these fine things in here with the winder open, this room on the ground floor, like it is. It's been a real treat to see such elegant clothes, an' I hope your married life'll be happy. The Footes have all got terrible onreasonable tempers, they say; but I hope you'll be able to manage Charlie. Good-by, all."

Miss Phemey walked home slowly. Even the thought of the darts she had planted in Mrs. Ridley's capacious breast brought her no real comfort, when the vision of the snowy wedding dress rose before her.

"Things ain't edge even yet," she murmured. A low growl of thunder startled her, and she hastened into the house to shut out the cutting flare of the lightning. When the kettle boiled she set her lonely table and made tea. The quick thump of heavy rain drops on the roof made her start nervously. Night had come with the storm, and after her supper was over, Miss Phemey sat in the dark and meditated. About ten o'clock the rain ceased, and she flung the shutters open. The stars were shining now. The air outside was cool and damp and fragrant. She looked over toward the Ridley house, and as she did so their last light went out. Miss Phemey strained her eyes to no avail. All was darkness there.

"I'm a-goin' to do it," she said aloud, determinedly. Rumaging over the table, she found a pair of scissors. She took a match from the box beside the window and unlocked the door. The moon was creeping up, a flat disk of pale yellow. Miss Phemey looked down at herself and saw that she still wore her best dress. "It'll be all drabbled," she thought; then, recklessly: "I don't care, nohow."

She brushed against the dripping flowers beside the garden path, and held her breath as the gate gave a whining cr-e-ak. Out on the road, walking noiselessly, she went. Once she heard a team coming and crouched in a corner of the worn fence, behind a little gum tree sprout, till it was past. She recognized the doctor's rig, and her heart came up in her throat and beat there with great frightened leaps; but he passed by and safely she crept on.

At last, after a seemingly unending journey, she reached the Ridley's gate. The maples threw deep shadows, and, so, sheltered, she reached the house. Round to the left wing—slowly—slowly—and the window was still open! She stopped and looked in. The moonlight lay in patches on the floor, the dresses spread upon the bed, and there, within reach, it fell full upon the wonderful pearl beading of the wedding dress and made scintillating lights. Miss Phemey saw all this, and slowly—slowly—her hand went out toward those glistening beads. A quick jerk, and the waist of Emma May Ridley's wedding dress lay across her knees. She sought the seam in the middle of the back. She could feel the despised chain stitching, and she slipped her fingers deftly along toward the collar. What was this? A loose end of thread—a little pull—r-i-i-i-i-ip—it was done. In a spasm of fear Miss Phemey hustled the waist through the window, back into place, and ran into the concealing shadow. Out to the gate, down the road again—she was almost home. Suddenly she stopped and gave a little chuckle.

"Them bastin's'll hold it together so nobody'll s'spect—lucky she left 'em in. But when Emma May puts it on, big an' fat as she is, it'll bu'st square up the back like a frog." She couldn't help laughing at the idea; it tickled her fancy so. She forgot her wet feet, her draggled, muddy skirts, and went to bed with a smile still pulling at the corners of her mouth.

The next morning the exposure had done its work. She was hoarse and feverish, and there was a sharp pain that stabbed her at every breath. "Threatened with pneumonia," the doctor said, and commanded her not to stir from her bed, though she could not have done so had she wished. The neighbors were very kind, and attended her faithfully, and the tenth day found her sitting up, very weak and frail, but with life in her eyes and voice.

Mrs. Emerson, the town gossip, came in and brought a bundle.

"Jest as soon as you git able, Miss Phemey, I want you to make me a dress. It's one Mr. Emerson got me over to Bristol, an' he showed real good taste for a man, I must say. Look-a-there, ain't that fern leaf real pretty?"

"It's just beautiful," assented Miss Phemey. "Seems if you'd have Miss Maxwell make it up, bein' she's from the city an' all."

"She'll never cut into a piece of goods f'r me, I c'n tell you," said Mrs. Emerson, with emphasis. "Ain't nobody told you how she made Emma May Ridley's weddin' dress and never sewed up the back, an' Emma May, not suspicionin', put it on an' busted it clean wide open? O' course, you was sick an' didn't git to the weddin'; but I was there, an' the weddin' party was nigh an hour late jest on that account. Nothin' but a bastin' thread to hold it together; such shiftlessness! Course, bein' bad luck, Emma May never tried on the dress after it come home, like she did the others, an' I c'n tell you she was hoppin'. People at the church didn't know what was the matter. No'n-deed, Miss Maxwell makes no clo's f'r me."

After her visitor was gone, Miss Phemey lay back on her pillows and looked out of the window a long time.

"'Twas an awful mean trick, I know," she said, at last. "'Twasn't right; but I got this spell o' sickness to pay up fer it, an' that butter knife was solid silver and real expensive. I'm evened up all 'round—an' somehow—I jest can't care."

PUZZLES WISE MEN.

Strangest of Living Beasts Discovered in Africa.

Scientists Do Not Know Whether to Class It with the Horse or Antelope—Creature Had Been Considered Extinct.

Sir Harry Johnston's discovery of the helladotherium, living in the forest depths of the Congo Free State, and his shipment of a skin and two skulls of the animal to the British museum has excited a good deal of interest among students of fossil remains in both hemispheres. Remains of this gigantic creature had been found in Greece and in Asia Minor, but it was generally accepted that the creature was extinct. The discovery of the creature in the Semliki forests may be a further inspiration to those enthusiasts who have long nursed the hope that somewhere the mammoth may yet be found alive.

From the fossil bones of the helladotherium it had been classed with the giraffe, but these remains had given no hint of the peculiarity of shape and markings found in the okapi, as the living creature has been called by the Congo natives.

When Henry M. Stanley passed through the Congo forests years ago he heard stories of a strange, horse-like creature sometimes found by the natives. From their descriptions he was in doubt whether to class it with the horse or the antelope. Commissioner Johnston had been interested in the creature, and when he was sent to the Congo Free State he went on the hunt for it. Dwarfs of the forests were his first informants, and they were of the opinion that it was a kind of zebra. At Fort Mbeni the Belgian officers and garrison confirmed the story. Through Commandant Eriksson at the fort the English commissioner arranged to get the skin and skull from the native hunters, and these natives have just made their promises good.

Measured by the skins now on the way to the British museum, the helladotherium is as large in body as a full-grown ox. Proportionately, however, its neck is not larger than that of a horse, this fact being reconciled because of the animals withers rising only a few inches higher than the hind quarters. The head is large in proportion to the body, its outline suggesting the head of the South American tapir. The nostrils are two long slits, completely covered with hair and resembling the nostrils of a giraffe. The lips apparently taper to a point. There are no front teeth in the upper jaw, as the animal is a true ruminant, and the front teeth in the lower jaw are so small and feeble as to suggest that the creature, like the giraffe, must possess a prehensile tongue for feeding. If this is not the case, then the long and prehensile lips secure most of the animal's food, which consists of leaves.

The peculiar markings of the creature's skin are its most attractive points. The cheeks are yellowish white and the muzzle is brown. The forehead is a vivid red, narrowing down into a thin black line continued along the ridge of the nose to the nostrils. The long, asslike ears are of a deep reddish brown, with black silky fringes. The neck, shoulders, stomach and back are a deep reddish brown, which in parts has almost a crimson tinge. The hind quarters and hind legs, down to the hocks, and the front legs from below the elbow to the wrist joint are boldly striped in purplish black and white, the white having here and there faint touches of orange. The hind legs from the hock downward are of a creamy color. The front legs are also cream color, but a bold black line runs down the front of the leg in an oblique manner. The fetlocks of all four feet are black and cream color. The tail is bright reddish brown, with a black tuft at the end. There are three horn cores similar to those of the giraffe. By long disuse these horn cores have degenerated into rounded bumps on the skull, two of them being situated a little above the eyes and one at the beginning of the nasal bones.

As to the habits of the animals, they are found only in the densest forests, traveling and feeding in pairs. They are timid and not easily stalked, the natives most often taking them in pitfalls. The flesh is excellent for food and the natives set great store by the skins, which are used for ornamental purposes.

Platinum Becoming Scarce.

Scarcity of platinum is causing concern in the medical, electrical and photographic worlds. The price has been gradually going up until now it is quoted at a higher figure than at any time since its discovery. It is now quoted at $36 an ounce.

INSANITY OF SUDDEN WEALTH

Some Queer Things Are Done by People Who Have Become Rich Unexpectedly.

People who, after years of grinding poverty, suddenly come into great wealth sometimes put their new fortunes to peculiar uses. Certainly they should be allowed to do so without harsh criticism, for the strangest things done by the newly rich are done to realize a dream which has cheered the heart when the days were full of trouble scarcely to be borne, and helped to lighten the great load of poverty.

Awhile ago an Englishman, who all his life has never been able to keep his feet shod properly, suddenly came into a large fortune. The first thing he did was to give an order for shoes to several shoemakers, so arranging it that he could put on a new pair of shoes every day in the year. How often he had said to himself in his years of poverty, when his toes were sticking out of his shoes or the water coming into them: "Oh, if I ever get any money, won't I just blow myself on shoes." The opportunity came, and the first thing he did was to indulge in an orgy of new shoes.

A miner who came into an unexpected fortune gave a great feast to his workmates. Often when the miners were eating the contents of their dinner-pails down in the dim galleries of the mine he had thought of what a feast he would like to spread there for himself and his fellow workmen. So, when he came into his fortune he had one of the galleries of the mine lighted and decorated, and a great and costly feast served there to the miners, at which he presided.

Another man who suddenly became rich bought all his particular friends a complete outfit of clothing, even going so far as to furnish each of them with a gold watch and chain. Then he invited them to a famous feast, at which all sorts of expensive luxuries were served. When the guests reached their homes each found an envelope with $50 in it, and a note saying that the money was to pay for a short vacation. This generous man, unfortunately, died in want and misery not long after receiving his windfall.

A rather romanic way of spending money was that adopted by the builder of the Beggar's bridge, which spans the River Esk. When poor he had the greatest difficulty in meeting his sweetheart who lived on the opposite bank of the river, owing to the Esk often being swollen and so impassable, even to a good swimmer. The ardent lover, when distraught one day, registered a vow that if ever he became rich he would take good care that no Eskdale lover should ever suffer again in the manner he suffered. He became rich, and fulfilled his vow by the erection of the Beggar's bridge.

Willie's Perplexity.

When Willie came home last night he was more convinced of the uselessness of schools than he ever was before. Asked the nature of his latest trouble, he explained that "postpone" had been one of the words in the spelling lesson of the day. The teacher had directed the pupils to write a sentence in which the special word should appear.

Along with others, Willie announced that he didn't know the meaning of the word, and so could not use it in a sentence. The teacher expalined that it meant "delay" or "put off," and encouraged the youngsters to try. Willie's thoughts were on pleasanter things than school, and his made-to-order sentence was: "Boys postpone their clothes when they go in swimming."

PERSIA MUST YIELD.

Ultimately the Shah's Realm Will Be Absorbed by Russia.

Another Step Toward the Bear's Inevitable Conquest of Asia—Why the Russians Are the Best of Colonizers.

John Kimberly Mumford, writing of Russia's conquest of Asia in the World's Work, discloses how the empire of the czar reaches out into Persia, with the manifest intention of some day, in the fullness of time, enfolding the realm of the shah. One need be in Persia only a little time, says Mr. Mumford, to realize the Russian predominance. Persia is Russian. That this is true is manifest in many ways that are a study of the efficacy of the peaceful method, a revelation of Muscovite versatility. Everywhere things Persian are disappearing, and the Russ is substituting for them his own memorials in brick and stone, steel and steam and electricity.

Russia's progress to the south during the last 70 years has been quiet, but by no means accidental. It is not at all mysterious, though often so called. It is simply the carrying out of a definite plan, a waiting plan, based on slow but persistent advance. This advance has been facilitated by the inexplicable policy of England. Mr. Mumford says:

"Sir Henry Drummond Wolfe, former representative of Great Britain at the court of Teheran, secured for English corporations, by virtue of the loans, concessions of all sorts, looking to the development of Persia, banking charters, mining charters and the like. He retired from the post leaving the English in possession of material rights and privileges throughout the kingdom, and in control of the custom house receipts of the gulf ports as security for interest on monetary advances. That position the present British government has to all appearances abandoned. In England's refusal to guarantee the Persian loan of 22,500,000 roubles lay the opportunity Russia had long looked for, and to her indorsement of the obligation she attached the most sweeping and subversive of conditions, including, first of all, the wiping out of all debt to England. Prompt conformity to these has been exacted. The money which had been borrowed from England was all repaid, in compliance with the Muscovite demand, within two years after Russia had taken up the sponsorship and the rights that accompanied it."

COUNT DE LAMSDORFF.
(Russian Statesman Who Has Undermined England in Persia.)

In conclusion Mr. Mumford says: "The Russian knows the people he holds sway over and manages them as no other can, for their blood is in him. * * * He conciliates native agencies at every step of the way. * * * He is mindful of the admonition of Paul I.; he remembers that he is 'only at war with the English and is the friend of all who do not give them help.' He 'assures men of the friendship of Russia.' He annihilates memories; he weans peoples from regrets. He plays upon their vanity until it is transmitted into loyalty; he grafts upon his already conglomerate speech something of the language of the conquered, and the next generation speaks with the tongue of Moscow. In brief, he finds a barbarian, and, moving on in the prosecution of his eternal purpose, leaves a Russian. That is what he has been doing in Caucasia and Transcaucasia, as well as on the far side of the Caspian, and that, reasonably assuming that England will not interfere strongly to block his progress to the south, is what he will ultimately do in all parts of Persia; what that will mean, in the struggle which is bound to come some day, the map shows. * * * That he aspires to the possession of all Asia there seems no longer any room for doubt. There are great obstacles in his path; he removes them. He has one way in Manchuria, another in Iran. But he is building warships as fast as he is taking up land in Asia. He anchors them now in Port Arthur; next in Bushire and Bender Abbas. How soon will the searchlights of his cruisers sweep the harbors of Calcutta and Bombay?"

This Horse Works a Pump.

John Garberick, of Bucyrus, O., has a pump at his barn where he waters his stock. One of his horses would take hold of the handle with his teeth and pump until he had sufficient water to quench his thirst. The other horses when thirsty would appeal to him and he would pump for them. The horse quickly wore out the pump handle, and Garberick put in a chain pump. The horse is now studying its mechanism, and frequently attempts to operate it.

QUEEN RANAVALONA.

Deposed Ruler of the Island of Madagascar Soon to Be a Guest of the City of Paris.

According to a cable dispatch, Queen Ranavalona, of Madagascar, who was exiled from her country by the French four years ago, and taken to Algeria, is to be granted her long-expressed wish to visit Paris. Ranavalona has been happier in Algeria than she was in Madagascar, where she was a virtual prisoner in her palace. Since her exile she has been living in a fine villa provided by the French government, which also has allowed her $5,000 a year and a staff of servants. At the island palace her principal amusement was flying kites from her palace window. The dusky queen has not lost her taste for chewing tobacco, cigarettes and jewelry, and continues to have her gowns made by Worth, the fashionable Paris tailor. Her jewelry is said to be worth $2,000,000.

Queen Ranavalona was taken from Madagascar at two o'clock one February morning in 1897, after six hours' notice to get ready. She and her two uncles had been detected in a plot to overthrow the French, who have been in Madagascar for two centuries. The men were executed, while the queen was deported to Bourbon island, and later to Algeria.

FIRE-LIGHTING DEVICE.

An Automatic Contrivance Which Makes Early Rising Unnecessary, and Works Every Time.

The illustration shows an automatic device for lighting fires, which has just been patented by John M. Leek, of Knoxville, Tenn., who states that the object he has in view is to provide a simple contrivance by which a fire may be ignited in the kitchen range at any desired time, so that the housewife is not required to rise early in the morning and enter a cold room for the purpose of starting a fire. This device might also settle the question of who should get up and light the fires by eliminating it altogether. The arrangement consists of a rotary shaft actuated by a coiled spring, with an abrasive surface at one end and an ordinary alarm clock at the other, and a fuse or wick for leading the blaze from the matches to the kindlings in the stove. The mechanism is placed on the hearth of the stove, with the wick supported by a wire hanger, the matches being gripped in a clamp, which holds them against the roughened surface of the wheel. As the wick has been previously soaked in oil and several matches are provided for ignition independently of each other, there is small chance of failure.

Hereditary Suicidal Mania.

An extraordinary case of hereditary suicidal mania is reported from Paris. A skilled artisan in wrought iron has been found by his wife hanging quite dead from the ceiling in their dining-room. The man left a letter saying that he was forced to commit suicide because he had reached the age of 35 years, at which his forefathers before him had all taken their own lives. The police inquiry has shown that the latter part of the man's statement is correct. The suicide mania runs in the family and irresistibly gains possession of each member as they attain their thirty-fifth year. The man's father and grandfather, and lately his uncle, all died by their own hand when they reached that age. Since his last birthday deceased had been depressed and told his wife and his friends what was preying on his mind was the uncontrollable force, which he was powerless to resist, urging him to commit suicide during the year.

LARGE DIPPING PLANT.

Texas Has a Cattle Bath Which, for Size and Effectiveness, Is Without an Equal.

The government bureau of animal industry has recently, through a series of experiments, solved an important problem bearing upon the health of cattle. It is the establishment of large dipping vats in the center of the stock raising districts of Texas and the south for immersing cattle in a chemical solution which effectually destroys parasites infesting their skin. When cattle from a diseased territory are to be shipped into a non-infected district it is important that they be freed from all pests. The best and only remedy has now been found to pass the cattle through a disinfecting bath, or, as it is termed, to "dip" them. "Dipping" infected cattle into a saturated solution of sulphur in extra dynamo oil will destroy all parasites.

BIG TEXAS DIPPING VAT.

Recently the Fort Worth Stock Yards company built a large dipping plant and placed it at the disposal of the bureau of animal industry, where the first demonstrations have been carried out. One of the problems in regard to the bath was to find a chemical oil which would not have an irritating and heating effect upon the cattle. For this purpose a number of samples of various lubricating oils were examined, and one of light specific gravity, called extra dynamo, was selected.

A train load of 311 cattle was dipped in a large vat of the stock yard in July last. These cattle were raised and bred in Texas, and were infested with Texas fever parasites at the time of the dipping. The weather, which had been remarkably cool up to this time, suddenly changed to intense heat, and, it being desirable not to expose the cattle to the sun immediately after the dipping, they were not passed through the vat until after sunset. By 11 o'clock at night all had gone through without a single accident, and they were at once loaded on clean cars, bedded with hay and shipped to Rockford, Ill. Of the 311 cattle all save four arrived in good condition at their destination. The casualties were principally caused by extreme heat during the first day of travel and the confinement incident to shipment. A careful examination showed that not a single parasite had survived. Most of the cattle showed absolutely no indications of having been dipped, the skin being soft and flexible in all cases.—N. Y. Herald.

FEEDING SOAKED CORN.

When Combined with Good Pasturage It Affords an Ideal Summer Ration for Pigs.

There appears to be quite a difference in the opinions of breeders in regard to feeding soaked corn to the spring pigs during the summer time when running on the pasture and at a time when the old corn is hard and sometimes difficult for young pigs to eat. I have a decided preference for soaked corn, getting the best growth and better results than from feeding the dry corn. My plan is as follows: I get two barrels that will hold water, and then pour in one the quantity of corn that I wish the pigs to eat during the next 36 hours' time, then I add to the corn clean water until it is covered some three inches, leaving it to soak for 36 hours. I then commence feeding from the first barrel, and at the same time fill the second barrel, which will be ready to commence on when the first is fed out. After the first is fed out, clean the barrel and fill it as before. This is a clean, easy digested, wholesome food. The corn has lost nothing by the operation, only the heated or burning feature of it, which is injurious to all young, growing stock when fed to any extent. You can feed this kind of food without danger of splashing it over you, which is not the case with slop made from mill feeds, which not only gets on your clothes, but the pigs as well in feeding. This manner of feeding will make rapid growth, and when on good pasture a complete ration.—J. G. Trueblood, in Swineherd.

Windmill Power Is Cheap.

A windmill will pump water for stock, irrigation and all other purposes; it will turn the wheels of the mill; it will wash, churn, turn the grindstone, turning lathe, cider press, etc.; it will grind bones for the hens, saw wood, chop feed, shred fodder, shell corn, run fanning mill—there is no end of the jobs it can be set to work on if properly harnessed. Without a single exception the windmill is the cheapest power nature puts into the hands of man. Every farm should have a good, standard made windmill. —Farm Journal.

How He Saved.

Corporal William L. Dawson, just returned from soldiering in the Philippines, walked into a Salina real estate office the other day and planked down the cash for an 80-acre farm.

He had saved $2,000 in less than three years of army life, and the item reminds us of the remark made by a Topeka soldier boy, having no reference, however, to Corporal Dawson:

"You say you can't understand how a soldier can bring back from the Philippines more than his entire pay amounted to?" said the Topeka boy. "Well, ain't you going to allow anything for poker?"—Kansas City Journal.

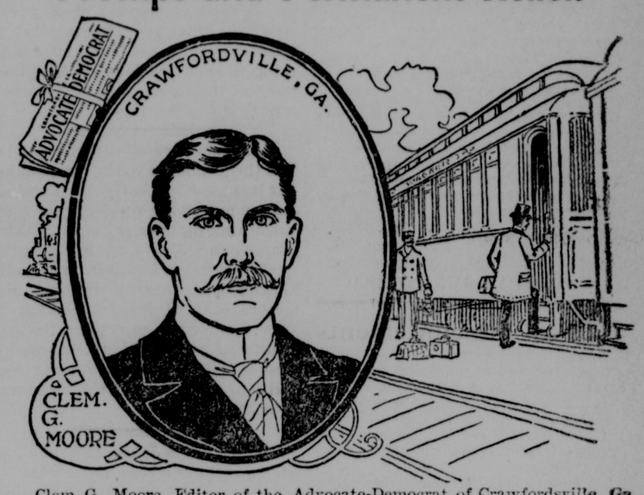
FOR SYSTEMIC CATARRH
Peculiar to Summer Pe-ru-na Gives Prompt and Permanent Relief.



Clem G. Moore, Editor of the Advocate-Democrat of Crawfordsville, Ga., writes the Peruna Medicine Company as follows:

Gentlemen—"After four years of intense suffering, caused by systemic catarrh, which I contracted while editing, and traveling for my paper, I have been greatly relieved by the use of Peruna. I gave up work during these years of torture, tried various remedies and many doctors, but all the permanent relief came from the use of Peruna. My trouble was called indigestion, but it was catarrh all through my system, and a few bottles of Peruna made me feel like another person, noting the improvement after I had used the first bottle. Peruna is undoubtedly the best catarrh remedy ever compounded.—Clem G. Moore.

Captain Percy W. Moss, Paragould, Ark., says: "I think Peruna is undoubtedly the finest and surest catarrh cure ever prepared, and it has taken but two bottles to convince me of this fact."

Judge Wm. T. Zenor, of Washington, D. C., writes from 213 N. Capital Street, Washington, D. C.:

"I take pleasure in saying that I can cheerfully recommend the use of Peruna as a remedy for catarrhal trouble and a most excellent tonic for general conditions."—Wm. T. Zenor.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

Newspaper Frauds.

"Non-partisan" papers, edited by partisans, are the most patent humbugs of the age. In commenting upon public matters they start out non-partisan, but wind up partisan. They are simply frauds. A partisan paper is the more to be admired. It sacrafices patronage for principle. It is more honest, for it does not play for both sides, and does not pretend to be anything than partisan. There is nothing antagonistic to honesty in being partisan, and there is every inducement to dishonesty in being non-partisan or independent. The most despicable object is a partisan who pretends to conduct a non-partisan or independent paper, and then by his acts endorses every principle and policy which his party espouses.—Westminster (Md.) Advocate.

IT IS very clever in the opposition press to praise the Federal authorities for promptness in bringing to justice faithless servants in Maryland's census work. The Democratic editors still insist, however, that a new count was necessary. Sixty thousand dollars thrown into Democratic channels is a political boost not to be sneezed at!

SINCE our expose last week of the scheme of the Allegany crowd of political tricksters to foist upon the people of Garrett county a ticket which is nauseating in the extreme it has required much buttonholing and logrolling to screw the courage of some of the Allegany county candidates up to the sticking point.

The article referred to was an eye-opener for many of our people who suspected that everything was not altogether as represented to them but were unable to solve the riddle. The effect has been remarkable in many sections of the county and has succeeded in enlightening some who were about to take the plunge. The result has been that the chances of the Allegany county candidates to receive the nominations and be elected by the votes of Garrett county citizens have fallen away below par.

Outside influence may be a good thing in some sections of Maryland but in the mountains of Garrett county it will not down.

IT WILL be several months yet before the plums are ready for picking, but it is none too early for Republicans to realize the necessity for vigilance and preliminary work. With proper effort Maryland can this fall be shifted to the Republican column. Let the Democrats be defeated, not for the sake of the emoluments of office, but for the good of the State in a material way—the bettering of business conditions and the general prosperity of the people of the Commonweaith.

WITH William Jennings Bryan preparing to make a tour of the country as the apostle of liberty, and Senator Clay, of Georgia, stating that the Democrats can only achieve success by dropping all populism, the outlook for the Democratic party is not full of serenity. For two successive elections the Democratic party has been more interested apparently in smashing the gold element than in serving the people. It is very probable that several elections will now witness an effort on the part of the gold men in the Democratic party to smash the silverites, the Republican party, in the meanwhile, looking after the national affairs. It's a clear case of there being no Democratic party without Bryan and of there being no party with Bryan.

To Make the Fight in the Counties.

If the advice of some of the State leaders is accepted the Democrats will concentrate their efforts in the counties and allow Baltimore to go as it pleases in the fall.

Even some of the city people interested in the success of Mr. Gorman recommend this course. They say the party in Baltimore is so rent asunder that a union of forces is out of the question. Others, again, insist that the regular organization can win out in the First and Second districts if given proper encouragement.

One of Mr. Gorman's most devoted adherents, and he is not allied to any one of the factions, stated Monday that no concessions need be made to any of those desiring to be placated, as they had not sufficient following to affect the result. The point he made was that the City Hall forces could not drum up any support in East Baltimore and that only in the Third district had Mr. Morrison any following. As the latter is hopelessly Republican it did not matter how the Crescent people voted. The Second district he regarded safely Democratic, anyhow; it mattered not how strong the opposition would be.

"At the same time," he continued, "I am sure we could win without the city. We had much greater odds to contend with in 1897, when the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and every newspaper in the city was against us, and, even then, we could have captured the Legislature had we given the counties our undivided attention. Then, again, the State administration was in Republican hands, whereas now our own people are in control."

"You take a very optimistic view of the situation," remarked another leading Democrat, who was standing nearby. "I entertain a very different opinion. As it appears to me, our chances are not at all bright. I know that in some of the counties the conditions are not much better then they are in the city. Nor are they likely to improve in the near future.

The discussion became quite animated, and ended in the disputants adhering to their opinions.

Subsequently a ward leader identified with the regular organization, and who is usually well informed, acknowledged that conditions were, to say the least, unpromising.

"The State people left us in the lurch last spring," said he with some bitterness, "and they have no right now to look to us for support when their interests are at stake. It was a great blunder to give up the city when, by concerted effort we could have carried it. Of all the leaders Mr. Rasin alone made a fight, and he was antagonized not only by the Republicans, but by Democrats as well. Now, when it is too late, those who are responsible for our defeat realize the effect it is having on the counties. I do not know any of the plans of Mr. Gorman's friends, but I do know they will be lucky if they succeed in inducing the Democrats to register. In my ward none of those regarded as independents who have heretofore voted our ticket will register. They have told me so."

This view is a reflex of the opinion of a majority of the Democrats. They entertain little or no hope of getting together, and unless there is a decided change the State managers will waste no time on the city. They will look to the counties.

The Republicans in the city are more interested in their organization fight than in the general election to follow. There appears to be an inclination to fight all along the line. The leaders say they cannot stop these contests if they would, and would not if they could. It is a healthy sign. When it comes to selecting candidates for the Legislature, however, they propose to use their influence to secure the selection of only the best equipped men.

Chairman Goldsborough will be in Baltimore Tuesday again and take up the work in the counties.

Foraker Sounds the Keynote.

Senator Joseph B. Foraker, is his speech before the Ohio State Republican convention, has emphasized the national character of the state election in Ohio this fall. Speaking of the administration of Governor George K. Nash, he declared that it had been so efficient that even Ohio democrats could not complain and no issue could be made of it. Therefore every vote cast in Ohio next November would be either for or against the administration of William McKinley, with that degree of certainty as if he were the candidate.

The plea for a large Republican vote in Ohio this year is based on the necessity for a continuation of the present industrial conditions. Senator Foraker truly says: "The achievements of the past four years are still in large measure incomplete and insecure. We have unexampled prosperity, but a democratic wave would blight it. We have added new luster to our arms, and new glory to our flag, but an application of democratic politics would tarnish one and dim the other. We have expanded our limits, advanced our jurisdiction and assumed new responsibilities, but democratic ascendancy at this time would mean abandonment, retreat and national humiliation."

It is not only the duty of Ohio republicans, but of republicans throughout the United States, Maryland particularly, to give an emphatic vote of confidence to the present national administration. The issue that exists in Ohio is equally prominent in Maryland. By compassing the defeat of the republican party Arthur P. Gorman would fain return to the United States Senate. Should his ambition be gratified, no more bitter foe to republican prosperity and progress in all Christendom could be found than he. Gorman is for self alone, and while he may pretend to have the better interests of his state and party at heart, his past record does not sustain the pretense.

The Third Party Movement.

That was a curious compound of political irrationalism that gathered in Kansas City the other day and launched a new third party movement on the troubled sea of politics. Populists of all persuasions, Free Silver Republicans, Socialists, Single Taxers and Bryan Democrats were in attendance. Every folly known to later-day politics was represested. They seem to have been all on hand, and that they were there with a purpose is demonstrated by the fact that they took themselves seriously and did actually organize a new party. How it was possible for one combination to assimilate such widely varying irrationalism is quite beyond comprehension.

This third party movement is proclaimed as being distinctly a Missouri affair; that it is primarily designed to operate in the national field is plainly discernable. Its schedule of principles proves that Missouri is far too small for this new movement. Here is what the new movement has set out to accomplish:

Public ownership of all public utilities, as railroads, telegraphs, &c.

While awaiting the legislation necessary to secure public ownership, rigid control of freight and passenger rates and severe penalties for rebates and other discriminations by railroads. Taxation of railroads and other public utility corporations in the same proportion as the value of farm and other property.

Direct legislation by the initiative and referendum to the end that the people may initiate good legislation and veto bad legislation.

Graduated income tax to the end that wealth, which receives government protection, shall bear its just share of the cost of the government.

That whatsoever is used as money shall be full legal tender, issued by the general government in sufficient volume for business purposes, and that volume fixed in proportion to population.

Just election laws throughout the State.

Home rule for cities and abolition of the present system of using the police as a standing army to carry primary elections in the interest of dishonest politicians representing still more dishonest special priyilege corporations.

Election of United States Senators by popular vote.

Excepting the last three these principles are of an essentially national character. They comprehend problems which Missouri is incapable of solving. The fact that they are given precedence over local State questions proves that Missouri is a secondary consideration.

As a national affair, there can be no doubt of the mission of this new movement. For ten years the political cranks of the country have been pulling at cross-purposes. There are a considerable number of these individuals; at one time they were strong enough to usurp control of the Democratic party; but they feel that control slipping away from them and, preferring to be a factor rather than a mere pest, they have decided to form all the cranks under one banner. That is the purpose of this new movement. It will afford a soft place for the cranks to light when the Democracy finally kicks them out and when the Populist party disintegrates. They will make a fuss for a brief season, but it will soon be over. If it hastens the final elimination of Bryan and Bryanism it will serve a useful purpose. That it will do so can hardly be disputed, for among such a combination of irrationals Mr. Bryan will, however much he may now deny connection with the new movement, come naturally to be the leader.

Communicated.

To the Editor of the Republican.

In my communication to THE REPUBLICAN of the 13th inst. I promised to write again in the next issue, but the serious illness of a member of my family prevented it.

And now before taking up the subject in mind I will refer to a letter in the Journal of the 20th inst. signed "Republican." I admit that in time of peace his suggestions might meet with the heartiest approbation by the majority of the Republican party in the county. But at this particular time, and coupled with the doubts that shadow good advice coming through any other than the regular channel for Republican advice over any other than the true name of the writer, the suggestions must lose their centripetal force, and as it is the inherited privilege of every voter in the county to attend the primaries, it follows that we and not the machine are in the fault. It is still further the inherent privilege of any qualified male citizen of the county to seek office at the disposition of the voters and I presume if any of the quartet and the unknown others referred to were seeking office they would certainly have the nerve to announce themselves, for according to the scripture, those coming in any other way than the open gate are thieves and robbers, which epithets belong to none of the four honored and christian gentlemen mentioned, neither I presume to the unknown.

But enough of this. Let us get down to facts. As I said in my first letter, we are in the midst of difficulty and to our State Assembly in 1902 we must look for relief and a solution of the problems, and who are better qualified to undertake the business confronting us than those who participated in the effort to secure justice to the people of our county and the Republican institutions of the State at the last regular and the extra session. Hence I believe we will make a great mistake by the nomination of any other than Hon. Robert A. Ravenscroft for the Senate. I urge this without fear of censure; not because our party lacks men enough of brains and education who could serve the people with equal intelligence and success under different circumstances, but from the fact of his knowledge of and familiarity with the duties to be performed, and I believe the voters of Garrett county are too sensible and alert to allow their minds to be prejudiced against the doctor for flimsy reasons. Let us once more forget factional feeling and put our shoulders to the wheel and help to roll it on to victory. I have no fear as to the other nominations. They will be satisfactorily made. Attend the primaries, instruct your delegates and all will be well.

Asking your deepest consideration of this matter, I am

Yours truly,
S. E. FLOWERS, SR.

July Court.

The non-jury term of the Circuit Court will convene here on Monday when Judge Stake is expected to be present. There are but few cases for trial, the most important one being that of Merriam vs. The Cumberland Paper Company which was continued from the term closing last week.

West Virginia Telephone Combine.

A movement has been started and a meeting of the interested parties already held to merge all the independent telephone lines in West Virginia into one company. It is estimated that the value of the property under the consolidation will reach $1,000,000. The new company will be capitalized for several times that amount. A committee has been appointed to inspect and report upon the various properties and the big scheme will likely be perfected within a few weeks.

Real Estate

Under and by virtue of the power vested in the Treasurer of Garrett county, Maryland, by Section 51, Chapter 566, of Acts of the General Assembly of Maryland for the year 1890, title "Garrett County," sub-title "County Treasurer," and also by Section 52, Chapter 566, as amended by the General Assembly of Maryland for the year 1898, the undersigned, as late Treasurer in and for Garrett county, Maryland, will on SATURDAY,

July 6, 1901,

at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. at the front door of the Court House in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, offer and sell at public auction to the highest bidder for cash, all of the following pieces or parcels of land lying and being in Garrett county, Maryland, to-wit:

No. 1. TWELVE HUNDRED ACRES OF A TRACT OF LAND CALLED "DECAPOLIS" AND IMPROVEMENTS thereon, situate in Election District No. 6, Garrett county, Maryland, and described in a deed from Fanny E. Stockbridge, widow, and Henry Stockbridge, Jr., and wife, James A. Garey and wife and William T. Carson and wife to Joseph F. and Hanson B. Lewis, bearing date April 27th, 1895, and recorded in Liber E. Z. T. No. 26, folio 575, &c., one of the land records of Garrett county, Maryland. This land, or so much thereof as may be necessary, will be sold to pay and satisfy the taxes due and in arrear thereon for the year 1897, as is charged on the assessment books of said Garrett county in the name of Joseph F. and Hanson B. Lewis.

TERMS OF SALE:—Cash on day of sale. The right of redemption extends to six calendar months from day of sale by paying to the purchaser the amount of the purchase money with interest thereon at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum and all costs. Conveyancing at cost of purchaser.

THOMAS B. WILEY,
Late Treasurer.

WANTED—A sexton for St. Matthew's Episcopal church. Apply to Rev. W. H. Osmond, rector.

Mrs. H. S. Whetsell, of Kingwoad, is the guest of Mr. and Mrs. George Fleming on Alder street.

Townshend & Son's line of trunks and valises is the largest and cheapest in town. 14 4

Dr. and Mrs. John K. Mitchell, of Philadelphia, have arrived at Deer Park to spend the summer.

Townshend & Son have a nice, neat line of plaids, percales, organdies, colored lawns, lace curtains, bedspreads, sheets, etc., away down.

Chas. Bosley has returned home from Clarksburg, W. Va., where he was employed during the winter at his trade.

Naylor & Co. have a fine line of spray pumps on hand as well as the largest variety of pumps for deep and shallow wells in the county. We also do pump repairing. 13 3

Rev. R. B. Ward, of Cameron, W. Va., dropped into Oakland rather unexpectedly Tuesday morning and spent the day here very pleasantly with his numerous friends.

Senator Ravenscroft accompanied by Henry Speicher, Esq., one of the Accident merchants, came up to Oakland Sunday night and returned home Monday morning.

A severe sprain will usually disable the injured person for three or four weeks. Many cases have occured, however, in which a cure has been effected in less than one week by applying Chamberlain's Pain Balm. For sale by all dealers.

It would be well for the town authorities to cut the luxuriant shrubbery which line nearly every street in town before some stranger wanders into it and becomes lost. It is entirely too bucolic.

Mr. Austin Brown, who has charge of the branch store of Messrs. D. E. Bolden & Co. at Piedmont, came home sick last Friday and remained here until Monday, at which time he was much improved.

FOR SALE:—The Lutheran parson age, located on the corner of Fifth and Green streets, in Oakland, near the court house. Contains 8 rooms, hallway, cellar and porches; excellent well of water. Will be sold cheap. Apply to or address Rev. George I. Uhler, Oakland, Md.

Dr. Henry W. McComas has made some very substantial improvements to his property on Second street. A large and handsome barn has been erected, his residence repainted and put in good condition and the grounds about his premises enclosed by a new fence.

Chief of Police J. M. Stanton left Oakland Sunday morning for Cincinnati, Ohio, where he went as a delegate to the National Convention of the Knights of St. John as a representative of the Oakland branch of the order. He will return home Friday evening. During his absence his place on the police force is being filled by William Newman.

The work of building the foundation for Messrs. D. E. Bolden and Truman West's building was begun Monday. The location is one of the best in town, it being at the intersection of Liberty and Second streets. The building will be two stories high, iron and plate glass front and will contain a number of rooms suitable for offices and business purposes.

Every time there is a heavy rain the sewer mouth at the Dixon & Kelso corner on Second street becomes clogged and in consequence the street at that point is always covered with an inch or two of slimy sticky mud and filth after the water recedes and to remove which is a bill of expense to the corporation. The inlet to the sewer should be made double the size.

You may as well expect to run a steam engine without water as to find an active, energetic man with a torpid liver and you may know that his liver is torpid when he don't relish his food or feels dull and languid after eating, often has headache and sometimes dizziness. A few doses of Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets will restore his liver to its normal functions, renew his vitality, improve his digestion and make him feel like a new man. Price, 25 cents. Samples free at all drug stores.

The only time when I would cut off my advertising would be when I had more business than I could possibly attend to and when I had made up my mind I would not increase my facilities. If I were making all the money that I wanted to make, if my business had reached a position which completely satisfied my ambition, I would stop advertising. Even then I would not stop very long, because if I did the business would start on the down grade. You have to advertise to make business and to hold it and to increase it.—Shoe and Leather Facts.

Capt. Robert H. Gordon and family, of Cumberland, have taken rooms at Hotel Bosley for the summer.

Hon. A. F. George, of Swanton, spent the greater portion of the week in this section circulating among his friends.

Max Good, Esq., of St. Louis, who is in Oakland with his family for a few weeks, spent last week in New York.

Rev. L. W. Roberts and family, who spent the winter at Buckhannon, W. Va., have returned to Oakland for the summer.

Mrs. L. B. C. List, of Washington, who is to have charge of the Loch Lynn Hotel again this year, arrived from Washington on Saturday last.

Strawberries are beginning to come into market from the local truck farms adjacent to Oakland. The fruit has a delicious flavor and is an abundant crop.

Ferris Bosley, son of Mr. and Mrs. George L. Bosley, who was at Wilmington, Del., during the fall and winter attending school, returned to Oakland last Saturday morning.

Rev. George I. Uhler will preach at the Deer Park Lutheran church on Sunday morning and evening. At the morning services the sacrament of the Lord's supper will be administered.

The members of the Epworth League Chapter of Oakland will hold a strawberry and ice cream festival in Offutt's new hall on Tuesday evening next. The Oakland Concert Band will furnish music for the occasion.

Call at druggists' and get a free sample of Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets. They are an elegant physic. They also improve the appetite, strengthen the digestion and regulate the bowels. They are easy to take and pleasant in effect.

B. F. Laughlin has returned to his home at Oakland after spending some time visiting here. Ben is quite popular in Morgantown and everyone was glad to see him again.—Morgantown Dominion.

Mrs. Leslie Carter, the distinguished actress, is registered at The Oakland, having arrived here last night. Just prior to Mrs. Carter's debut on the stage she spent the summer in Oakland.

Truck farming and growing small fruits have become quite important industries here, as has also the dairy business. There are quite a number of men engaged in both lines of business, all of whom are quite prosperous.

If you see a Pan-American postage stamp with the express train upside down on it, lay it carefully away for future reference. It is claimed that a sheet of these stamps was accidentally printed and that they are now commanding $30 apiece among stamp collectors. Look out for the engine when it is upside.

An outspoken exchange pertinently remarks: "Ladies should remove their hats in church. No sermon can inspire a man who is looking into a lop-sided aggregation of dead birds, stuffed weasels, chameleon skins, ribbons, beads, jets, sticks, straw, paper, flowers, corn tassels and thistle down. It makes a sinner feel in the wilderness.

Corner Stone Laying.

Sunday afternoon at four o'clock the corner stone of the new Catholic church now in course of erection in Oakland will be laid with appropriate ceremonies by Bishop Curtis, of Baltimore, assisted by a number of other dignitiries of the church.

The foundation for the new building is going up rapidly and everything will be in readiness for the ceremony on the day named.

For the occasion excursion trains will be run on the Baltimore & Ohio railroad and on the George's Creek railroad. At Piedmont connection with the B. & O. will be made by the George's Creek road, the excursion train being scheduled to arrive here at 10.01 a. m. The return trip will be made at 7 p. m. A large body of visiting Catholics is expected here from all points along the two routes.

Oakland Concert Band.

Since the resignation of Prof. S. C. Smith as instructor of the band here the name of the organization has been changed to that of the Oakland Concert Band. The members practice three nights every week and are arriving at a degree of proficiency which is remarked upon by many. Taking into consideration the youthfulness of the members and the grade of music played by them it will not be long until the organization will occupy a leading place among musicians of Maryland.

The band has accepted an invitation to be at Piedmont on July 4th and to participate in the celebration there on that day.

Col. Casteel Passed.

Col. D. T. E. Casteel has heard from the examination which he took, but not officially. He has passed, making a very good grade. Nothing has been heard from the department in reference to it or to the assignment which he is to get. This will be heard within the next week or so however. He will go into the army as a first lieutenant and be the only one from this state who has had the good fortune to get that high up in going in.

Friday, the Longest Day.

Friday, June 21, was the longest day in the year. The sun rose on that day at 4:34 o'clock in the morning and set at 7:28 o'clock in the evening, making the day 14 hours and 58 minutes long, or 2 hours and 30 minutes longer than the shortest day in the year, which is December 21. Summer also begins on Friday.

Father and Son Drowned.

Dr. A. J. Baker and his only child, a boy of eight years, went swimming in Valley river at Grafton Monday evening. The boy got beyond his depth and the father tried to rescue him. Both were drowned. The bodies were both recovered. The childless widow is prostrated, and it is feared the shock will prove fatal.

Train Had a Hoodoo Trip.

Baltimore and Ohio train No. 3 had a hoodoo trip Monday. At Jersey City the engine was overturned and the engineer killed. At Rowlesburg Arthur Poling, a small boy, was run down and killed. At Wilsonburg a flock of sheep was encountered and six killed. At Petroleum the engine broke and had to be replaced. At Torch, Ohio, a freight wreck was encountered and a lay over of three hours necessitated.

Grantsville Booming.

Grantsville, Garrett county, is enjoying a decided boom. Town lots have doubled in price and are being sold rapidly and lands in that section are being eagerly sought by speculators and investors. The prime cause of the boom is the undeveloped coal, mineral and timber lands in that part of the county which will be opened to the markets of the world through the building of the Jennings Bros. railroad up the Casselman river.—Meyersdale Commercial.

County Convention Will be Held in Opera House.

Owing to the fact that court will be in session here on Monday the County Convention advertised to be held in the court house will be held at the opera house instead.

Election Officers to be Appointed.

The Board of Supervisors of Elections will be in session on Saturday of this week when officers of registration for the fall election will be appointed. Applications for appointment in a number of districts have already been filed with the board.

Extensive Improvements at Stone House Farm.

Mrs. David F. Kuydendall returned yesterday from a week's outing at the Stone House farm, where she with a party of friends, had gone to inspect the improvements lately made to the old homestead and outbuildings of this noted farm. Aside from the fertility of the soil and the very valuable minerals underlying it, this is one of the most delightful places in Western Maryland, situated upon the National pike 11 miles above Frostburg, and high upon the crest of the Allegheny mountains, containing about 1200 acres of land. This farm has long been noted as a resort in summer. Pure mountain water and balmy air, with cool breezes at night, make it one of the most delightful spots to pass the heated term. Recently some very extensive improvements and repairs have been made to the residence and outbuildings. The interior of the dwelling has been fitted up to accomodate a few friends who may be so fortunate as to be the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Kuykendall. Wide porches supported by massive columns run the full length of the house.—Cumberland Times.

New Store at Deer Park.

The E. M. Rhoages Co., a new firm in the mercantile business, will establish a general store at Deer Park within the next few days. The firm offers to sell cheap for cash or trade.

The Fourth Will Be a Quiet Day in Oakland.

The Fourth of July this year will be like all other days so far as the majority of Oakland's citizens are concerned as nothing has been arranged to take place here that day except possibly excursion and picnic parties to the woods. In years past the Fourth of July celebrations held in Oakland have been successful in a great measure, but the work in arranging the program has entailed lots of hard work and the expenditure of large sums of money by the several committees without any appreciative return aside from the advertising given the town by those who came here from a distance.

Teachers' Examinations.

County Superintendent Ed A. Browning conducted examinations here on Friday and Saturday last for teachers taking first and second grade certificates. Eighty applicants for certificates were examined. Of this number twenty-three took the first grade examination which includes all the higher studies. As none of the papers of those taking the examination have yet been passed upon by the board the averages cannot at this time be given, although indications point toward success for many of the applicants.

An Immense Range.

Recently the well known hardware merchants and stove dealers of Oakland, Messrs J. M. Davis and Sons, installed in the Loch Lynn Heights Hotel a mammoth Born Steel French range with all the modern appliances and fixtures, including a carving table, steam table, cabinet ovens, charcoal broiler, coffee and tea urns, laundry stove and kitchen supplies generally. The range is probably the largest in the county. At all events it is the most complete. The contract price received by the Messrs. Davis for the range and fixtures amounted to nearly $500. The range is giving excellent satisfaction and is quite an advertisement for our home people.

Two Additional Trains.

Monday morning two additional trains were put in service on this division of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. These trains will run daily except Sunday and are scheduled to reach Oakland as follows: No. 5, westbound, 6.46 p. m.; No. 6, eastbound, 9.40 a. m. The trains will not run on Sundays. Parties wishing to reach Oakland Sunday from way stations will be greatly inconvenienced, especially those desirous of attending religious worship here from Hutton and other near-by points.

The Summer Schools.

The summer schools at Mountain Lake Park will open August 1st and continue for a term of four weeks. Dr. James H. Morgan, of Dickinson college will teach Greek and Latin; Prof. Hans Froelicher, of Woman's college, Baltimore, Germanic Languages; Adolph Rambeau, of Boston, romance languages; Hugh A. Curran, of New Jersey, natural sciences; William W. Landis, Dickinson college, mathematics; Dr. Homer B. Sprague, English literature; Charles C. Rounds, New York, pedagogy; art department, Miss Jennie White of Baltimore; music, Prof. W. H. Pontius; violin, Miss Benaldine Smith, Indianapolis, Ind.; elocution and oratory, Mrs. Olivia Sanger Hall, New York; kindergarten, Miss Pollack, Washington; photography, A. A. Line, Carlisle, Pa.; physical training, Miss Virginia Smith, Indianapolis; domestic science, E. Marion Coling, Oil City, Pa.

EPWORTH LEAGUE CONVENTION.

San Francisco, Cal., July 18-21, 1901.

When planning your trip do not forget that the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway is the most popular, best equipped and safest railroad in the Northwest. On all of its through lines of travel this railway runs the most perfectly equipped trains of sleeping, parlor, dining, free reclining chair cars and coaches. It is the only line with electric reading lights in each berth in the sleeping cars run between Chicago, St. Paul and Minneapolis and between Chicago and Omaha.

All regular travelers know and appreciate the merits of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway. In purchasing your tickets see that they read via this line, and you are assured the very best of service.

For rates, descriptive literature, etc., inquire of your local ticket agent, or address John R. Pott, District Passenger Agent, 810 Park Building, Pittsburg, Pa. 1t

Judge Sloan to Come to Oakland.

His Honor Judge David W. Sloan, who has been quite ill for a number of months and who recently returned from a trip to Atlantic City somewhat improved in health, has rented the Phillips property on the Mountain Lake Park road and expects to arrive here next week to remain during the summer.

Prosperous Times at The Oakland.

Manager Chas. E. Headley, of The Oakland, informs us that nearly every room in the house has been engaged for the summer. Already there are nearly a hundred guests being entertained.

PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, at the January Session in the year nineteen hundred of the General Asembly of Maryland, bills were passed proposing amendments to the Constitution of the State:

First.—By amending section 9 of Article 5, of the Constitution of the State.

Second.—By amending section 4 of Article 3, of the Constitution of the State.

Third.—By amending section 2 of Article 3, of the Constitution of the State, which said bills and amendments are in words following, to wit:

CHAPTER 185.

AN ACT to amend section nine, of Article 5, of the Constitution of this State, and to provide for the submission of said amendment to the qualified voters of this State for adoption or rejection.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, (three-fifths of all the members elected to each of the two Houses concurring,) That the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to Article 5, of the Constitution of this State, and if adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof, herein and as by law provided, it shall supersede and stand in the place and stead of section nine of said Article.

SECTION 9. The State's Attorney shall perform such duties and receive such fees and commissions or salary not exceeding three thousand dollars, as are now or may hereafter be prescribed by law; and if any State's Attorney shall receive any other fee or reward than such as is or may be allowed by law, he shall, on conviction thereof, be removed from office; provided that the State's Attorney for Baltimore city shall receive an annual salary of forty-five hundred dollars, and shall have power to appoint one deputy, at an annual salary not exceeding three thousand dollars, and such other assistants at such annual salaries not exceeding fifteen hundred dollars each, as the Supreme Bench of Baltimore City may authorize and approve; all of said salaries to be paid out of the fees of the said State's Attorney's office, as has heretotore been practiced.

SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That the foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of this State, shall be, at the next general election for members of the General Assembly, to be held in this State, submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof for their adoption or rejection, in pursuance of the direction contained in Article 14, of the Constitution; and at said election the vote on said proposed amendment shall be by ballot, and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words "For the Constitutional Amendment" or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voter shall elect, and immediately after said election one return shall be made to the Governor of the vote on said proposed amendment, as directed by the said Fourteenth Article of the Constitution.

Approved April 5, 1900.

CHAPTER 432.

AN ACT to amend section four, of Article 3, of the Constitution of this State.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, (three-fifths of all the members of the two Houses concurring,) That the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of this State, and if adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof as herein provided, said section shall supersede and stand in the place and instead of section four of Article 3, of said Constitution.

SECTION 4. As soon as may be after the taking and publishing of the National Census of 1900, or after the enumeration of the population of this State, under the authority thereof, there shall be an apportionment of representation in the House of Delegates, to be made on the following basis, to wit: Each of the several counties of the State, having a population of eighteen thousand souls or less, shall be entitled to two delegates; and every county having a population of over eighteen thousand and less than twenty-eight thousand and souls, shall be entitled to three delegates; and every county having a population of twenty-eight thousand and less than forty thousand souls, shall be entitled to four delegates; and every county having a population of forty thousand and less than fifty-five thousand souls, shall be entitled to five delegates; and every county having a population of fifty-five thousand souls and upwards, shall be entitled to six delegates and no more; and each of the four legislative districts of the City of Baltimore shall be entitled to the number of delegates to which the largest county shall or may be entitled under the aforegoing apportionment, and the General Assembly shall have the power to provide by law, from time to time, for altering and changing the boundaries of the existing legislative districts of the City of Baltimore, so as to make them as near as may be of equal population; but said district shall always consist of contiguous territory.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, shall, at the next election for members of the General Assembly of this State, to be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, nineteen hundred and one, be submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof, for their adoption or rejection, in pursuance of the directions contained in Article 14, of the Constitution of this State; and at the said election the vote on said proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be by ballot, and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words, "For the Constitutional Amendment," or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voter shall elect, and immediately after the said election due returns shall be made to the Governor of the vote for and against said proposed amendment, as directed by the said Article 14, of the Constitution.

Approved April 7, 1900.

CHAPTER 469.

AN ACT to amend section two of Article 3 of the Constitution of the State.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, (three-fifths of all the members of the two Houses concurring,) That the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of this State, and if adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof, as herein provided, said section shall supersede and stand in the place and stead of section two of Article 3 of said Constitution.

2. The City of Baltimore shall be divided into four legislative districts as near as may be of equal population and of contiguous territory, and each of said legislative districts of Baltimore City, as they may from time to time be laid out, in accordance with the provisions hereof, and each county in the State, shall be entitled to one Senator, who shall be elected by the qualified voters of the said legislative districts of Baltimore City, and of the counties of the State, respectively, and shall serve for four years from the date of his election, subject to the classification of Senators hereafter provided for.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution shall at the next election for members of the General Assembly of this State, to be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, nineteen hundred and one, be submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof for their adoption or rejection, in pursuance of the directions contained in Article 14 of the Constitution of this State; and at the said election the vote on said proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be by ballot, and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words, "For the Constitutional Amendment," or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voter shall elect, and immediately after said election due returns shall be made to the Governor of the vote for and against said proposed amendment, as directed by the said Fourteenth Article of the Constitution.

Approved April 7, 1900.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JOHN WALTER SMITH, Governor of the State of Maryland, in pursuance of the provisions of section one of Article fourteen of the Constitution of the State, do hereby order and direct that a copy of said bills proposing said Constitutional Amendments be published in at least two newspapers in each county where so many may be published, and where not more than one may be published, then in that newspaper, and in three newspapers in the City of Baltimore, one of which shall be in the German language, once a week for at least three months preceding the next ensuing general election (which said general election will be held on Tuesday, the 5th day of November, nineteen hundred and one,) at which the said proposed amendments shall be submitted to the qualified voters of the State for adoption or rejection, so that each amendment shall be voted on separately.

Given under my hand and the Great Seal of Maryland.

Done at the City of Annapolis on the 12th day of June, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and one.

[SEAL] JOHN WALTER SMITH,
Governor of Maryland.

By order of the Governor:
WILFRED BATEMAN,
Secretary of State.

THE GREAT AFTERWHILE.

Ah me! the things that we mean to do,
In the great, great afterwhile;
When our ship comes in,
We're sure to begin,
And we'll keep right at it, too.

Yes, yes, my boys, I know it is true
That we mean just what we say,
But afterwhile is a mythical place
In the realms of an unborn day.

The railway of life is supposed to run
Through the land of this unborn day,
And the great afterwhile is a station there,
Where people do fine things, they say.

But thousands, my boys, are traveling this road,
Whose hands are as white as the snow,
Who meant to stop off at the great afterwhile
In the years of the long ago.

But somehow or other they never quite reached
The place with the high-sounding name,
So they traveled along with the rest of the crowd
Who hunted for fortune and fame.

Yet fortune or fame ne'er came to them, boys,
And, neither, will they come to you,
If you wait to begin, in the great afterwhile,
All the grand things you mean to do.

'Tis best, then, to begin right here,
In the land of the greater to-day,
And work while you wait,
For your ship might be late—
Then you'd miss half of life, I fear.
—G. W. Hendricks, in "Success."

THE PRICE OF THE ∴ ∴ BARKER'S RABBITS

By Carroll W. Rankin.

THE Barkers lived in a little house surrounded by a big garden, about midway between the high school building and the church; and the little Barkers always took a decided interest in whatever happened to be going on in either establishment. If a concert was given in the schoolhouse, the little Barkers gave one as nearly like it as possible in their barn. If there was a wedding at the church, the little Barkers promptly duplicated it upon the side porch of their house. Little Katherine's baby doll had done duty at so many christenings that even its own mother couldn't remember the names it had accumulated.

Nothing ever "stumped" the little Barkers. No imitation was ever too difficult. Their Salvation Army was, in their own opinion at least, a trifle better than the real one that nightly paraded the streets; and as for their circus—but mere words could not adequately describe that circus. It is enough to say that no one who saw it ever forgot it.

The older children outgrew these pastimes in the course of years. Alice developed into a most proper young woman, and no one would have suspected that dandified Harold's principal ambition had once been to shine as a chimney-sweep. Katherine abandoned the doll of many names, and grey into a stately and rather solemn young person of 15, and it fell to Tom and Grace to keep the neighborhood in a cheerful frame of mind. They did their duty nobly, however, and managed to have proper and easily shocked Alice upon pins and needles most of the time.

Mrs. Higherest, the wife of the banker, who lived opposite the Barkers in a big, beautiful house, furnished them with many valuable ideas; and her most gorgeous entertainments were faithfully copied, down to the minutest details. But as Grace and Tom grew older, they, too, began to grow dissatisfied with mere immitations, and to long for real weddings and funerals, and real receptions, with something more substantial in the way of refreshments than imaginary ice cream.

When Mrs. Highcrest entertained a distinguished novelist for a whole week, giving dinners, and finally a huge reception to him—in spite of his protests, for he was a modest lion—the little Barkers were green with envy. Mrs. Barker attended one of the dinners; Alice and Harold were invited to the reception, but the only invitation vouchsafed by Mrs. Highcrest to the little Barkers was an urgent one to remain upon their own side of the street while these festivities were in progress.

But Tom and Grace had reasons for wishing to meet the novelist. Grace, all unconscious that such a speech might be uncomplimentary, was longing to tell the writer that she thought the cover of his book was extremely pretty, but that she didn't care a great deal for the story; while Tom, who intended to be a novelist himself, in order to have dinners given for him, wanted to find out how the thing was done.

Consequently, when Mr. Barker discovered in the celebrity one of his own almost forgotten college mates, and invited the great man to prolong his stay for the purpose of paying him a visit and talking over old times, there was joy in the little Barkers' hearts. Mrs. Barker, however, was not quite so jubilant. She knew the resources of the little Barkers. Alice, for the same reason, did considerable quaking in her shoes; and Harold took it upon himself to read his young brother and sister a series of lectures upon etiquette in general, with a few impromptu remarks upon the treatment of celebrities in particular.

For the first three days all went well; then Grace had an inspiration. An inspiration in Grace's hands was about as safe as giant powder in a match factory, and upon the appearance of the first symptom of anything like an inspiration, Grace was usually banished to bed, before the microbe should have time to develop into a full-fledged idea. Grace had learned to be cautious about revealing her thoughts, and her mother, being occupied with the problem of feeding the lion, failed to notice the preliminary signs.

The distinguished guest arrived on Wednesday. At recess time on Friday afternoon Grace unfolded her plan to a group of excited girls, while Tom, on the other side of the school building, was the center of a larger and still more excited group of boys.

"It's the chance of a lifetime," said Grace. "You can't afford to miss it. Remember the time. Admittance to all parts of the grounds, two cents."

"Three o'clock sharp," Tom was saying. "Oh, yes, he'll be there, sure. The minister's coming to play chess with him at half-past three. He'd rather play chess than eat. Oh, he'll be there all right."

At a quarter to three the following day a quiet, middle-aged man in glasses seated himself beside a little table upon the pleasant, vine-shaded veranda of the Barker house, quite oblivious to the fact that Grace, flat on her stomach in the grass, was printing along the veranda rail, in large letters with white chalk, the words: "The greatest show on earth. Only two cents."

A few moments later the patrons of the show began to arrive in little groups of two or three. Each child, after paying two cents to Tom, whose box office was discreetly screened from his mother's view by the large white rose bush near the gate, paused on the lawn to gaze for awhile at the unconscious celebrity, who was intent upon a chess problem.

After a prolonged stare, with mingled feelings of awe, respect and curiosity, and, above all, a desire to get the full worth of his or her money, each child withdrew reluctantly toward the back yard. Here they were received by Grace, who formed them by twos, regardless of size, into a long line.

"Now wait here until I come back," said she, when apparently the last child had arrived, "and mind you don't make a sound. If you do," continued Grace, who was born to command, "the game is all up, and you lose your money. A little noise would spoil it all. I won't be long."

"A few of my little friends," said wily Grace, appearing upon the veranda a moment later, "would be so glad if you would shake hands with them. They've heard such a lot about you." This, thanks to Grace, was strictly true, for she had talked of nothing but the novelist for three whole days.

"What? What's that? Oh, shake hands with your little friends? Yes, of course," said the novelist, reluctantly putting a printed chess problem into his pocket, and bringing himself back with an effort to an everyday world. "Why, really, my dear, I am very much touched. This is the prettiest, and probably the sincerest, compliment I have ever received."

The young conspirator had the grace to blush at this, but she did not allow herself to waver. She realized that it was too late for qualms of conscience.

"Please stand right here, where they can reach you easily," said Grace, adroitly placing the gratified author just behind the glaring inscription on the veranda rail, and standing back herself for a momentary but critical survey of the resulting effect. "Just a little more this way. There, you look very well, indeed! I'll be back in a minute with the children."

"WHAT'S THAT? OH, SHAKE HANDS WITH YOUR LITTLE FRIENDS?"

The novelist, somewhat surprised at the number of his admirers, shook hands cordially with each shy guest, never suspecting for a moment that mercenary Tom, with rabbits in his mind, had collected a penny in advance for each handshake.

It was the belated minister who, arriving upon the scene, discovered the sign upon the porch and pointed it out to the astonished novelist, who happened to have, fortunately, a keen sense of humor. The sound of their uproarious merriment brought Mrs. Barker and Alice to the porch, whereupon Tom and Grace promptly and discreetly vanished.

"Well," said Grace, when a safe harbor was reached, "we'll probably get whipped for this, even if we are too old; and Alice will go around in a state of mortification for the rest of her natural life, but he wouldn't have laughed like that if he'd minded very much."

"Anyhow," said Tom, philosophically, "we took in money enough to buy four rabbits, and I'm going after them right now, before anyone tells us not to."—Youth's Companion.

Matrimonial Shrinkage.

It was Ernest McGaffey, the writer of verse, to whom a lady said:

"O Mr. McGaffey, I have just seen your wife for the first time since your marriage; but I had supposed she was a taller woman. She seems shorter than when I saw her last."

"Certainly," said the poet, solemnly. "She has married and settled down."—Youth's Companion.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

"The Plagues of Agriculture" is the title of a work of which 100,000 copies are to be distributed free among Mexican farmers.

The secretary bird at the London zoo has been cinematographed while in the act of seizing, killing and carrying off a rat.

The street car system in Manila is inadequate, and it is the practice to hire cabs whenever one desires to go any distance in the city.

London, to all appearances, was never more prosperous than now. The theaters, music halls and concert rooms are crowded. Every hotel is full of visitors.

Municipal music has become such an important matter with the London county council that a musical director has been appointed at a good salary to take charge of the department.

The present population of Athens, in Greece, is only 80,000. There is no accurate census of the city when in its ancient glory, but it is supposed at one time to have contained 500,000 inhabitants.

Dr. A. P. Grinnell, of Burlington, has been astonished by his investigations as to the use of narcotics in Vermont. He says that in the regular drug stores and in 160 of the 172 general stores in the state of Vermont there is sold every month 3,300,000 doses of opium, besides what is dispensed in patent medicines, and besides what the doctors dispense, which gives one and one-half doses of opium to every man and woman in the state above the age of 21 years every day of the year.

SELDOM SAVE A DOLLAR.

Most Women Wage Earners Spend Nearly All They Earn on Their Dress.

No matter how large a salary a woman earns as typewriter, amanuensis or private secretary, she is seldom able to command a dollar three days after payday. They are always in financial straits, and nine times out of ten their salaries are mortgaged before they are earned, says the Chicago Chronicle. A few—a very few—manage to have their lives insured for small amounts and a proportion are sufficiently practical to join societies that pay sick benefits, but that is all. The remainder of their earnings is spent for pretty frocks and parasols and falfals, for matinees and summer trips.

To be sure, women do not make large amounts generally. There are few who draw a weekly stipend of even $25, but whatever they earn they spend. One young woman who always resolves that the next time her salary is raised she will put the extra amount in the bank each Saturday finds invariably when the addition to her wage comes that her expenses increase in proportion and the whole is spent before she knows it.

Another young woman known to the writer who is paid $35 a week for her labor spends every cent of it, while her brother, who receives but $25, saves five dollars each week and has made a tidy little sum by investments. The sister excuses herself by declaring that women's clothes cost far more than men's and that, while her relative can dress well on $500 a year, she can barely maintain a good appearance on the $800 she sets apart for tailor, dinner and evening frocks.

The remainder of her income goes in board, laundry bills, the small entertainments she gives and her annual trip to the seashore for a month's rest.

In contrast to this case is that of a young woman who was endeavoring to live on $15 a week, but whose efforts were frustrated by the good offices of an elderly friend who swept down upon this unprotected female every Saturday and wrested from her willfully three dollars. This the elderly friend put in a bank in her own name, so that the girl couldn't draw it out when she saw a love of a boa. It drew interest at three and one-half per cent. Then when a year later the young woman had an excellent position offered her in Chicago she found to her amazement that her long-headed friend had something like $160 to give her for the expenses of the trip.

This sounds like a dream or a fairy tale, but it is perfectly true, and it only proves that each "working woman" would be better off if she had some one to sweep down upon her and rob her temporarily of her hard-earned lucre. Left alone, the chances are she won't have a cent.

A Long Quarrel Adjusted.

There has been an estrangement between the governments of Austria and Mexico, dating back to the time when the Austrian Archducke Maximilian was executed in 1867 by the republican government, after the failure of the attempt to make him emperor of Mexico. During this long period there has been a complete suspension of intercourse between the two governments, but recent overtures to end the estrangement have succeeded. The Mexican congress has passed a bill reciting the fact of a reconciliation, and providing for a minister to Austria; and Austria will take similar action.—Youth's Companion.

Gift from Heaven.

"A wife," said the young man, "is a gift from Heaven."

The old gentleman sighed and then nodded.

"But what kind of a gift?" he asked.

"We get the sunlight and the gentle rain from Heaven," suggested the young man.

"And also the thunderstorm," added the old gentleman.—Chicago Post.

HOODOO HEARSE IN MAINE.

Antiquated Conveyance for Corpses the Cause of a Bitter Controversy.

It is hoped now that the evil reputation that has marked the late career of the Holden hearse has come to an end, says the New York Sun. The hearse was made in England more than a century ago and was brought over to Massachusetts as something unusual in the line of funeral splendor.

Having done its solemn duty in Ipswich, Mass., for nearly a quarter of a century it was sent down to New Wrentham, Me., and for 75 years was in constant demand for funerals in all parts of Hancock and Penobscot counties, often being sent more than 50 miles from home. The body of the carriage wore out four sets of wheels, and the revenues which it earned for its owners mounted up to almost $1,000 a year.

It had become the custom for the heaviest stockholder in the vehicle to drive the horse and attend all the funerals. Six hearse drivers grew old and died in the service. The seventh brought ill luck and final disaster.

Late in the fall of 1896 he was called upon to take a body from Bangor to Brooksville for interment. The surviving kindred of the deceased were poor, and the driver got a fee much too low for profit. To recoup himself he bought 600 pounds of salt codfish to take home in the hearse and sell. This act plunged Holden into a neighborhood row, which is still in progress. His critics said that the vehicle was for the exclusive use of the dead, and that if it was made to carry anything else such conduct was in the nature of sacrilege.

It was the bitterest fight ever seen in eastern Maine. Families became estranged over it, and aged men sent for lawyers in haste and drew up documents, declaring that their remains must not be carried to the grave in such a vehicle. It seemed for a time that the owners of the hearse were sure to win, because they showed old contracts with two cemetery associations in which the owners of lots agreed to employ this particular hearse at all burials in their yards. No sooner were these papers produced than the anti-hearse crowd began to fence off burial lots on their own land.

For the next six months it is declared that no enemy of the old hearse died, fearing the indignity of riding in a hearse which had once held codfish. Finally the courts upset the contracts.

From this time the patronage of the old hearse fell off, and it was dismantled and locked in the hearse house to await its own time of burial. If the enemies of the hearse had been content to let things rest where they were, the war would have ended there, but the grudge was so deep that the boys in the neighborhood amused themselves by stealing the rickety carriage and hauling it about the roads at night, leaving it in the yard of one of its supporters.

It was soon noticed that wherever the hearse was left a member of the household died in a short time. As the hearse was generally run into the yard of some one who owned shares in the vehicle, and as most of these owners were aged and would soon die in the course of nature, the deaths were not regarded as remarkable at first. But when the hearse continued to roam abroad at night, and death continued to visit the homes where it was left, a great fear took hold of the people.

Several meetings were held by those who saw an omen of death in every movement of the hearse, and the time was drawing near when the hearse was likely to be burned by an indignant and frightened people, when the constable caught five boys wheeling the hearse through the woods leading to Dedham. They were taken before a magistrate, who threatened to send them away to the reform school unless the hearse ceased to go abroad at night. The hearing took place in March. The hearse has not been out since, and all the people of Holden are enjoying excellent health. So it is hoped that the trouble over the hearse is ended.

Arrangements of Curtains.

The tendency noticed through the present season to arrange sash curtains flat across the window instead of looping them back will be still more pronounced this spring. A deep, scant, flaring ruffle, too, is among the novelties in these curtains, though they will not be much in evidence before autumn, as town houses shed, rather than take on, sash curtains in the spring. The flare in the ruffle referred to is produced by cutting the curtain in a slightly upward curve at the center before the ruffle is put on. White shades continue to be fashionably used. They should be of holland, as the cambric shades in white grow yellow quickly, particularly in windows of southern exposure. A few silk shades are seen, some of them with lace insertions and edgings, but they fade quickly, and their first cost puts them out of reach of most buyers.—N. Y. Post.

Ironing Made Easy.

Dry the starched articles perfectly, then dip them in a pail of boiling water and pass them through the wringer twice. They may then be ironed at once, or they may be rolled up in a dry cloth. The fabric may be ironed with greater ease after being dampened in this way than when sprinkled in the usual manner. Turpentine in starch gives an added whiteness and luster to the ironed article. Use one tablespoonful to a quart of starch.—Ladies' Home Journal.

MEN'S GARB FOR WOMEN.

Dr. Mary Walker Insists That Present Feminine Styles Are Unhealthful and Immoral.

Dr. Mary Walker for well-nigh 45 years has preached dress reform for women. Her ideas, as much as her peculiar adoption of male attire, have made of her a national character. She is now past 60 years of age, but is more than ever committed to her ideas.

In a recent article published by the Chicago American she advocates the adoption by women of male attire for the following reasons:

Did you ever watch Flora MacFlimsy stepping on or off a car? Could there be anything more grotesque? As the car approaches she grabs frantically a bunch of dry goods which has trailed for blocks behind her in the mud. Swishing them about her until she has bound up her knees as if in a vise, she essays to step into the car. But the yards of lingerie and dress hamper her. It requires the greatest effort to mount the step. It is oftentimes accompanied with the sacrifice of her expensive costume.

The other day as I left a Broadway car behind a Flora, I inadvertently stepped upon her ladyship's train. The rip of the sheeny silk brought terror even to me. She glared at me ferociously.

"I will pardon you," I said, "for taking up so much room; it seems hardly necessary that you should have a dry goods roll trailing behind you."

Bind your waists in steel splints and what happens? Congestion of the stomach and intestines. Congestion begets inflammation and the latter excitement of the part inflamed.

In my common sense attire I can travel faster than any other woman. My form of dress has to overcome a lighter atmospheric pressure, less specific gravity.

I can swing in and out of a car in less time than it takes Flora MacFlimsy to gather her skirts daintily.

There should be no sex in dress. A woman should not be forever proclaiming as from a sign board: "I am

DR. MARY WALKER.
(Has Preached Dress Reform for Women for Nearly 45 Years.)

a woman!" Why is it necessary for her constantly to conjure up thoughts of sex difference? I think it immoral.

To-day we call love a passion. True love is a quality of the mind, not of the body. Until men love with the mind woman will not have her right place in the world. Passion is brutal; love is divine!

Does the modern form of evening dress—undress I call it—appeal to the passions or the souls of men? Do the yards of dainty laces, the variegated hosiery, the thousand and one whatnots of the modern maiden's gown appeal to the purer or baser idea?

There would be fewer crimes against women if the suggestive in woman's wardrobe were eliminated. Modern forms of dress accentuate rather than subdue these evil suggestions. "What is most daring?" is the question with the modiste, not "What is purest?"

A woman's charms of person and mind should be her store of wealth. At present her physical charms are paraded before the world that all may see. She does not so parade her beauties of mind.

Sometimes her physical charms are counterfeit; they are used as a snare. She cannot counterfeit her mental qualities.

In trousers, waistcoat and frock coat woman would find protection that she much needs. She would be freer of motion and limb, would have better health, a cleaner mental condition and be man's superior in the things she should have most of—of purity of body and mind.

Soner or later my ideas will bear full fruit. The wheels of progress and intellectuality move slowly. I do not expect to live long enough to see my ideas of dress the vogue. I shall have to die; then the seed that I have sown will ripen and grow and bud and bloom—and I? Well, perchance I may be forgotten. It matters not so long as I have been even a means to a good end

NEW TYPE OF BEAUTY.

Although But Fifteen Years of Age Miss Nesbit Is Pronounced a Rara Avis by Artists.

Philadelphians are raving over a new type of American beauty exemplified in the person of Miss Evelyn Florence Nesbit, of that city. She is but 15 years old and two years ago went to Philadelphia from Pittsburgh with her widowed mother. Her father was the late Winfield Scott Nesbit, one of the foremost lawyers of Pittsburgh. Her mother, Evelyn Florence McKenzie, comes of a distinguished southern family, and she was a celebrated belle in her youth. It was not long after her appearance in Philadelphia that the beauty of Miss Nebit was remarked by many of the leading artists and sculptors. Already her face has been put on canvas by such painters as Carl Blenner, Carroll Beckwith, Levy and Irving Wiles Church.

It is Ryland W. Phillips, the artist photographer, who claims the honor of having first discovered this new beauty. Last October he arranged to have her come to his studio and pose for several pictures, which were later placed on exhibition at the Photographical society and created wide discussion. In speaking of Miss Nesbit, Mr. Phillips said:

"Miss Nesbit has a mobile face, yet she can change her personality in looks, gesture and effect quicker than anyone else I have ever seen. She can change her whole expression instantly from sorrow to gladness, every feature adding to the total transformation. Miss Nesbit is a great beauty. She has a splendidly developed head and a face showing unusual character. About her forehead there are lines of exceptional beauty denoting great intellectual power."

Besides her beauty, Miss Nesbit is endowed with a gift of dramatic talent and emotional capacity sufficient to warrant her in hoping to attain success on the stage, for which she is now preparing herself.

HOW TO BE HEALTHY.

Take an Air Bath Every Morning and Every Night for the Benefit of Muscles and Lungs.

Two baths, say the newest health authorities, should be taken every morning.

For no less important than the tub bath for the body is the air bath for the lungs.

Perhaps you have never taken an air bath and mistakenly fancy that it may be necessary to turn yourself inside out to accomplish it.

On the contrary, the directions are extremely simple.

You need no apparatus and it takes but a moment's time and very little effort.

Every night the lungs become filled up with impure air and more or less poisonous gases. A person may go all day without ridding his lungs of these impurities. Therefore it is as important to bathe the lungs every day as the body.

Few people know how to breathe correctly. The lungs are not filled by merely expanding the upper portions of the chest and raising the shoulders. The entire front of the chest should be forced out as one inhales.

There are a number of exercises for expanding the chest which you can practice in your room as well as in a gymnasium. A doorway will serve as well as the most complicated gymnasium apparatus. A narrow doorway is preferred. Stand directly under the frame and place the hands flat on the doorcasing, the tips of the fingers coming at the height of the shoulders. Walk through the door without removing the hands until you are arms' length away. This draws back the shoulders and brings the important chest muscles into play. Try this for 15 minutes every night and morning. It will help to wake you up when you rise and help you to get to sleep quickly when you go to bed.

Another plan is to expand the chest the same way before an open window. Stand about a foot back from the window, placing the hands on the window frame on either side at the height of the shoulders. Without moving the feet, let the body swing forward as far as possible and return to a perpendicular position. Practice this about 20 times night and morning at intervals of ten seconds.

Another exercise bath for the arms and lungs is to stand with the heels together and take a deep breath. Then stretch one arm backward and upward, then, the other, meanwhile moving the body backward, forward and to the sides while expelling the breath slowly.—N. Y. World.

Changes In Revenue Law

The Reduced War Taxes as They Go Into Effect July 1

Beginning with July 1 certain changes in the war revenue bill will go into effect. The original measure, it will be remembered, was enacted by congress June 13, 1898, just after the breaking out of the Spanish-American war. Just prior to adjournment the last congress made certain amendments to this act. Perhaps the changes that will be most noticed by the general public will be the removal of the tax on bank checks and drafts, sight drafts, money orders, leases, mortgages or conveyances in trust, promissory notes and telegraph messages. The tax on bankers of $50 for $25,000 and $2 for each additional $1,000 is to be retained. So also is the tax on stock brokers of $50, on pawnbrokers of $20, on commercial brokers of $20 and on custom house brokers of $10.

Proprietors of theaters and like places of amusement and proprietors of circuses are still to be taxed $100. The tax of $10 on all other exhibitions is also retained. The new law made no change in the tax of $5 levied on each bowling alley or billiard table.

Tobacco and snuff come in for a discount of 20 per cent. on the old tax. There is a distinction drawn in the case of cigarettes. The tax on those of a certain grade and weight is retained; on others the tax is reduced. Dealers in tobacco and leaf tobacco, and manufacturers of tobacco and of cigars, will be taxed according to the rate now prevailing.

On bonds, debentures, etc., and on certificates of stock of original issue the tax of 5 cents per $100 is to be retained. In the provision taxing transfers of stock 2 cents per $100, the same tax is extended to bucket shops. The tax on sales of products at exchanges is cut in half. In the case of sales of merchandise in actual course of transportation the tax is entirely removed. The tax on all forms of insurance is repealed.

Proprietary medicines, perfumery and cosmetics and chewing gum are all to be exempted from taxation. Petroleum and sugar refineries are still to pay one-fourth per cent. of their gross receipts in excess of $250,000. Each sleeping and parlor car ticket will continue to pay 1 cent to the government. Legacies of charitable institutions, religious, literary or educational in character, will not be taxed after July 1.

Epitaph and Pun.

One evening at a small party which included the two friends, Douglas Jerrold and Charles Knight, the author-publisher, the talk turned on epitaphs.

As they were walking home together, Knight, half lightly and half in earnest, asked the wit to write his epitaph for him. Jerrold made no answer, but when they came to the parting of their ways, he suddenly said:

"I've got your epitaph."

"Well, what is it?"

"Good Knight!"—Youth's Companion.

Traffic in Russia.

Early in April there were lying at the stations of three Russian railroads, waiting to be forwarded, 27,000 car loads of grain, equal to about 12,000,000 bushels, much of which had been waiting for months. Complaints that railroads are not able to handle their traffic are common in Russia.

Trout of the Ocean.

The weakfish is revisiting the Atlantic coast, much to the satisfaction of epicures, who know that the fish thus handicapped by its name is the trout of the ocean.

Out-Door Relief in England.

In the southwestern counties of England 37 out of every 1,000 persons are in receipt of outdoor relief. This number falls to 19 in the northwest counties.

Arsenic for Hardening Shot.

Shot is generally hardened by the addition of a small quantity of arsenic to the lead.

Mother and Queen.

Queen Victoria always made it a point to keep the religious instruction of her children as much as possible in her own hands. Once when the archdeacon of London was catechizing the young princes, he said:

"Your governess deserves great credit for instructing you so thoroughly."

At which the youngsters piped up:

"It is mamma who teaches us our catechism!"

It is not perhaps generally known that the queen occasionally taught a Bible class for the children of those in attendance at Windsor palace.—London Beacon.

In Honor of an Inventor.

A movement has been started in Georgia to perpetuate the memory of Eli Whitney by converting into an elegant country club the scene of his labors near Augusta, where he perfected his cotton gin. An organization has been perfected, and a charter for the club secured.

Free Medical Help.

In England 972,000 people a year receive free medical attendance, compared with only 230,000 in France, and the cost of these French invalids is only £58,000, compared with £150,000 spent in medical relief in Ireland.

A Big Battleship.

A battleship of 16,000 tons displacement, the largest ever designed, is to be added to the United States navy. If the proposed speed of 21 knots is secured, this ship will be the masterpiece in naval construction.

DEATH-DELAYING DISEASES.

Affections That Prolong Life Which Are Commonly Supposed to Hasten the End.

One of the latest medical theories is that certain diseases ward off death. Rheumatic people, for instance, are said rarely to die young. Why, the medical men are unable to say, but it is probable that the blood acquires some property which is fatal to the germs of other diseases. A doctor of experience has noticed the fact that in a family of five or six brothers and sisters, one of whom is rheumatic, that one will outlive the others, as a rule. If gout can be kept away from the heart and confined to the big toe the patient is likely to live to be 90 or 100 years old. It is said that this is due to the fact that the disease purifies the blood.

If one has an attack of smallpox and lives through it, he stands an excellent chance of attaining a ripe old age. In a census of aged people taken many years ago it was found that a large percentage of them were pock-marked. This led an eminent physician to make a calculation which proved that there were twice as many pock-marked people over 80 years old as there would have been had not the smallpox exercised a preservative influence. He accounted for this curious fact by concluding that the smallpox microbe frightens away all other microbes, just as rats frighten away mice from a house.

Deafness is said to have the property of adding to the victim's age. Now and then a deaf man is run over in a city street, but when deaf people prudently pitch their tents in the country their chances of a long life are extremely good. The true explanation of this is declared to be the fact that deafness saves people a lot of worry over small matters and from the wear and tear of noises.

Bronchitis often shortens life, but in some cases it has the opposite effect. A large number of the old people one meets cough all the year round with chronic bronchitis. One would think to listen to them that they must cough themselves to death soon, but that is not so. The coughing helps the heart to circulate the blood, and, in fact, gives exercise to many of the organs. Only for this daily exercise many old people's mechanism would get fatally clogged. Besides, a man with bronchitis will not sit in a draught, he will avoid getting wet and will not stay out half the night losing his sleep and "painting the town" with the "boys."

Perhaps the most surprising assertion is that disease in parents often confers long life on children. The contrary is believed, popularly, and no doubt there is some ground for the belief. Some time ago the British Medical association investigated the subject of old age. Taking 340 people aged from 80 to 90 years, they inquired into their family history. Here is the result:

There was cancer in 44 families; consumption in 65 families; gout in 30 families; rheumatism in 59 families; insanity in 13 families; apoplexy and paralysis in 42 families.

Thus there was a history of deadly diseases in the families of 253 of the old people. In 47 more families there was likewise some grave disease. And only 40 families were free, or said to be free, from those maladies which usually are supposed to be hereditary.

Homes of Royalty.

It is rumored in Great Britain that a royal residence is to be built in Ireland by the king. Queen Victoria, after her visit to Ireland last year, is said to have expressed a desire that in future some member of her family should visit Ireland every year, and King Edward is known to be intent on carrying out every wish of his mother, as far as known to him. It is considered probable that the king's only brother, the duke of Connaught, with the duchess, will spend a part of every year there, as they are greatly attached to the Irish people. The Irish return the feeling, especially as the duke bears an Irish title. They will have Clarence house as a London residence. The duke of Fife and the duchess (Princess Louise of Wales) prefer Scotland, as a rule, but a royal residence in London will be assigned to them. The duchess is not strong, and finds greater charm, it is said, in a quiet home life than in society. Father, mother and the little Ladies Duff are often to be seen at Brighton in a quiet part of the beach, playing with pebbles, spades and pails, like the most commonplace of citizens. —N. Y. Tribune.

Great Russian Canal Scheme.

An American engineer named Wilson and two Russian military engineers named Oschtschurski and Sarakowski have applied to the Russian government for a concession for constructing and maintaining a ship canal between the Caspian sea and the Black sea, says a St. Petersburg correspondent. According to the plans the canal is to be 560 kilometers in length and to cost 300,000,000 rubles. The minister of finance has gone into the scheme and referred it to the minister of communications, who will have to give his consent before the concession can be granted.—N. Y. Sun.

A Costly Funeral.

The most costly state funeral which has ever taken place was perhaps that of Alexander the Great. A round million was spent in laying Alexander to his rest. The body was placed in a coffin of gold, filled with costly aromatics, and a diadem was placed on the head. The funeral car was embellished with ornaments of pure gold, and its weight was so great that it took 84 mules more than a year to convey it from Babylon to Syria. -- Chicago Chronicle.

GREAT WORKSHOPS OF VULCAN

Immensity of the Steel and Iron Industry in the City of Pittsburgh.

Writing of "The Center of the World of Steel," Waldon Fawcett, in Century, describes Pittsburgh and its environs as Vulcan's greatest workshop.

To the superficial tourist it is, perhaps, only the dirtiest city in America. To the Pittsburgher, who is gripped by the fascination of iron-making, and to all who look through his spectacles, it is still the dirtiest but also the most magnificent of cities. To this typical resident its clouded atmosphere is symbolic only of rush and dash and power and the accumulation of wealth with splendid rapidity. Pittsburgh, moreover, is secure in her position as the capital of the domain of iron and steel. Coal crops out of the hills at her back; great engineering projects are making of the river that passes her gates an improved highway of commerce; her railroads are multiplying; and, finally, her metal manufacturers, reaching out for foreign markets, have discovered that they can utilize the very cars which bring iron ore back to the lakes the finished product, and there ship it through the St. Lawrence river direct to the ports on the other side of the Atlantic.

The great product of the Pittsburgh district in this present age is, strictly speaking, not iron, but steel. As a commercial commodity, the one has largely displaced the other. There are, to be sure, in almost every city foundries which handle only the metal which was once preeminent in the manufacturing world, but rails for steam and electric lines, beams for ships and sky-scrapers, armor-plate for war vessels, and heavy supports for bridges—in fact, all the commodities which may be produced profitably in large quantities—are formed of steel, and thus the product of nearly all the great plants in this crowded district reaches the consuming world in the form of the tougher and more elastic metals. Pittsburgh sends from her freight yards and docks each year millions of tons of this valuable material; enough, indeed, to fill a line of freight cars extending across the Atlantic, if such a thing were possible, and forming a stock in trade representing more money than the United States government receives in revenue from all sources within a year.

Although many of the immense iron and steel-making plants which surround Pittsburgh and constitute her modern defenses are under one general management, each institution is complete in itself. On the map the names Braddock, Bessemer, Rankin, Duquesne, Homestead and Munhall stand only for suburbs of the Iron city. Each, however, forms an important link in the chain of monster plants which stretches up the valley of the Monongahela, zigzagging back and forth across the river. These great establishments are not duplicates of one another, by any means, and yet, to a certain extent, the difference is only in detail. The rapid and thrillingly picturesque evolution of steel from iron ore may be watched in almost any one of them. The strands of burning metal, after having been pounded and pressed and rolled, may be measured off for the market as rails, sheets, boiler-plates, or any other of a score of forms, but the genesis of all is the same.

KING EDWARD'S HUMOR.

England's New Sovereign Enjoys a Joke as Well as Other People.

King Edward of England is a merry monarch. At least he was reputed to be merry before he attained his present august dignity.

Some years ago, when Arthur Roberts was singing his song "We are a merry family, we are, we are, we are!" the prince was asked for the solution of a knotty point. He merely shrugged his shoulders and said: "We are a royal family, V. R., V. R., V. R.!"

He was at the theater one night watching the famous Fletcher playing "Robert Macaire." The adventurer's coat was apparently a mass of rents and patches, but the prince's keen eye quickly noted that the garment was singularly well cut. After the play the prince sent for Fecher and asked him who his tailor was. The actor replied that Mr. Poole had made the coat he was wearing. The next day the prince sent for the tailor, who from that hour was a made man.

All the world knows that both the carriage and saddle horses of the prince of Wales have as part of their equipment a forehead band of the color known as royal scarlet. When the prince and his daughters ride in Hyde park their horses are, therefore, distinguished from those of other people by these particular forehead bands. One morning the horses of a certain financier and his two daughters were conspicuously adorned with red bands that are by etiquette reserved for the use of royalty. The prince and the young princesses, who were riding in the row, could not help noticing this vulgarity. On the following day it was seen that the prince had replaced his scarlet forehead bands by others of plain black leather, and the financier and his daughters had it all their own way in the matter of royal red.

WHAT THE TRAIN CRIER SAID.

It Relieved Four Frightened Parents and They Went Home Happy.

There was an excursion on one of the railroads a few days ago to a town in the center of the state. Two young women who went on the excursion missed the return excursion train to Chicago and stood around in the deserted depot of the country town in despair, says the Chicago Tribune.

"You see," said one young woman, "our fathers and mothers will be at the depot in Chicago when the train comes in and they will be frightened to death when we fail to arrive with the other excursionists. They will think all manner of bad things have happened to us. But what can de do?"

"Yes," said the other young woman through her tears, "if our people were at home this evening we might telegraph them, but they were all going downtown to the theater and I don't know what theater they went to. After the theater they were going down to meet us at the train. They will be simply frightened to death, and I'm afraid my father will get on the next train and come right down here after us. There are 700 or 800 people on that excursion train and there will be more than that number waiting for them at the depot, besides the crowds going out on the other trains, so it won't do any good for us to address our message to the depot. They would never get it."

"I know what to do," suddenly exclaimed the other young woman, as her face shone with the light of a brilliant inspiration.

"What?" gasped her companion.

"We will send a message to the train caller at the depot in Chicago and ask him to announce when the excursion train pulls in that we missed the train but are safe with friends here and will return on the first train to-morrow morning."

"O, that's just the thing," exclaimed the other maiden, and they hastily fixed up a telegram and sent it addressed to the train caller at the station.

So when the excursion train pulled into the Chicago depot that night the excursionists and the friends waiting for them were surprised to see the train caller clamber up on a bench, and in his most stentorian tones gravely announce:

"Limited train for St. Louis on third track. Cannonball for Toledo, Cleveland, Philadelphia and the east on first track. Miss Lillian Belleville and Miss Eugenia Thompkins missed the excursion train at Bloomfield and will spend the night with their relatives there, Mr. and Mrs. John Adams and Mr. and Mrs. Phil Allen. The young women are safe and happy and will return on the first train to-morrow morning. Passengers for Madison, St. Paul, Minneapolis and the northwest this way."

And four frightened parents breathed easy again and went home happy.

Warmed Over Tongue.

Cut cold tongue into small dice, and if there be any portions near the root that do not seem perfectly tender remove the fat and stew them in water to cover until tender, then add the better portions and any of the made gravy that may be left; or, if this be lacking, you may thicken the water in which the tongue has been stewed, and season it highly with lemon juice, Worcestershire sauce or catsup; heap mashed and seasoned potato round the edge of a platter and pour the warmed tongue into the center.—People's Home Journal.

Fields of Wheat in Which the Stocks Were So Thick It Was Impossible to Drive Between Them.

To the Editor:

A gentleman from Duluth made a trip through a portion of Western Canada last summer, and writing of what he saw, says:

"Wheat, for instance, will average twenty-five or thirty bushels to the acre. I saw shocks so thick in the field that it would be almost impossible to drive between them. Winters, it is said, are longer than near Duluth, but the Japan current, warm chinook winds and dry atmosphere make the winters comparatively mild."

Thousands of such testimonies are to be had from settlers who have taken advantage of the low-priced lands of Western Canada. During the present year new districts will be opened up in the Saskatchewan Valley, and advantage should be taken of this at once. Information can be had from any agent of the Government, whose advertisement appears elsewhere in your columns.

All Astonished.

If people are too conservative they are very apt to find cause for astonishment when some person they have overlooked does something worthy of praise, or some familiar medicine effects a great cure. Such was the fact in the case of Mr. Nimrod Price of Milford, Ohio, who wrote: "My wife, myself, and all our neighbors are astonished at the wonderful effects of your Lotion in curing a distressing eruption on my wife's face, it having done what no doctor, or other medicine, had done before." Help for Women

Who Are Always Tired.

"I do not feel very well, I am so tired all the time."

You hear these words every day; as often as you meet your friends just so often are these words repeated. More than likely you speak the same significant words yourself, and no doubt you do feel far from well most of the time.

Mrs. Ella Rice, of Chelsea, Wis., whose portrait we publish, writes that she suffered for two years with bearing-down pains, headache, backache, and had all kinds of miserable feelings, all of which was caused by falling and inflammation of the womb, and after doctoring with physicians and numerous medicines she was entirely cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

MRS. ELLA RICE.

If you are troubled with pains, fainting spells, depression of spirits, reluctance to go anywhere, headache, backache, and always tired, please remember that there is an absolute remedy which will relieve you of your suffering as it did Mrs. Rice. Proof is monumental that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the greatest medicine for suffering women.

Changes In Revenue Law

The Reduced War Taxes as They Go Into Effect July 1

Beginning with July 1 certain changes in the war revenue bill will go into effect. The original measure, it will be remembered, was enacted by congress June 13, 1898, just after the breaking out of the Spanish-American war. Just prior to adjournment the last congress made certain amendments to this act. Perhaps the changes that will be most noticed by the general public will be the removal of the tax on bank checks and drafts, sight drafts, money orders, leases, mortgages or conveyances in trust, promissory notes and telegraph messages. The tax on bankers of $50 for $25,000 and $2 for each additional $1,000 is to be retained. So also is the tax on stock brokers of $50, on pawnbrokers of $20, on commercial brokers of $20 and on custom house brokers of $10.

Proprietors of theaters and like places of amusement and proprietors of circuses are still to be taxed $100. The tax of $10 on all other exhibitions is also retained. The new law made no change in the tax of $5 levied on each bowling alley or billiard table.

Tobacco and snuff come in for a discount of 20 per cent. on the old tax. There is a distinction drawn in the case of cigarettes. The tax on those of a certain grade and weight is retained; on others the tax is reduced. Dealers in tobacco and leaf tobacco, and manufacturers of tobacco and of cigars, will be taxed according to the rate now prevailing.

On bonds, debentures, etc., and on certificates of stock of original issue the tax of 5 cents per $100 is to be retained. In the provision taxing transfers of stock 2 cents per $100, the same tax is extended to bucket shops. The tax on sales of products at exchanges is cut in half. In the case of sales of merchandise in actual course of transportation the tax is entirely removed. The tax on all forms of insurance is repealed.

Proprietary medicines, perfumery and cosmetics and chewing gum are all to be exempted from taxation. Petroleum and sugar refineries are still to pay one-fourth per cent. of their gross receipts in excess of $250,000. Each sleeping and parlor car ticket will continue to pay 1 cent to the government. Legacies of charitable institutions, religious, literary or educational in character, will not be taxed after July 1.

Epitaph and Pun.

One evening at a small party which included the two friends, Douglas Jerrold and Charles Knight, the author-publisher, the talk turned on epitaphs.

As they were walking home together, Knight, half lightly and half in earnest, asked the wit to write his epitaph for him. Jerrold made no answer, but when they came to the parting of their ways, he suddenly said:

"I've got your epitaph."

"Well, what is it?"

"Good Knight!"—Youth's Companion.

Traffic in Russia.

Early in April there were lying at the stations of three Russian railroads, waiting to be forwarded, 27,000 car loads of grain, equal to about 12,000,000 bushels, much of which had been waiting for months. Complaints that railroads are not able to handle their traffic are common in Russia.

The weakfish is revisiting the Atlantic coast, much to the satisfaction of epicures, who know that the fish thus handicapped by its name is the trout of the ocean.

Out-Door Relief in England.

In the southwestern counties of England 37 out of every 1,000 persons are in receipt of outdoor relief. This number falls to 19 in the northwest counties.

Arsenic for Hardening Shot.

Shot is generally hardened by the addition of a small quantity of arsenic to the lead.

Mother and Queen.

Queen Victoria always made it a point to keep the religious instruction of her children as much as possible in her own hands. Once when the archdeacon of London was catechizing the young princes, he said:

"Your governess deserves great credit for instructing you so thoroughly."

At which the youngsters piped up:

"It is mamma who teaches us our catechism!"

It is not perhaps generally known that the queen occasionally taught a Bible class for the children of those in attendance at Windsor palace.—London Beacon.

A movement has been started in Georgia to perpetuate the memory of Eli Whitney by converting into an elegant country club the scene of his labors near Augusta, where he perfected his cotton gin. An organization has been perfected, and a charter for the club secured.

Free Medical Help.

In England 972,000 people a year receive free medical attendance, compared with only 230,000 in France, and the cost of these French invalids is only £58,000, compared with £150,000 spent in medical relief in Ireland.

A Big Battleship.

A battleship of 16,000 tons displacement, the largest ever designed, is to be added to the United States navy. If the proposed speed of 21 knots is secured, this ship will be the masterpiece in naval construction.

DEATH-DELAYING DISEASES.

Affections That Prolong Life Which Are Commonly Supposed to Hasten the End.

One of the latest medical theories is that certain diseases ward off death. Rheumatic people, for instance, are said rarely to die young. Why, the medical men are unable to say, but it is probable that the blood acquires some property which is fatal to the germs of other diseases. A doctor of experience has noticed the fact that in a family of five or six brothers and sisters, one of whom is rheumatic, that one will outlive the others, as a rule. If gout can be kept away from the heart and confined to the big toe the patient is likely to live to be 90 or 100 years old. It is said that this is due to the fact that the disease purifies the blood.

If one has an attack of smallpox and lives through it, he stands an excellent chance of attaining a ripe old age. In a census of aged people taken many years ago it was found that a large percentage of them were pock-marked. This led an eminent physician to make a calculation which proved that there were twice as many pock-marked people over 80 years old as there would have been had not the smallpox exercised a preservative influence. He accounted for this curious fact by concluding that the smallpox microbe frightens away all other microbes, just as rats frighten away mice from a house.

Deafness is said to have the property of adding to the victim's age. Now and then a deaf man is run over in a city street, but when deaf people prudently pitch their tents in the country their chances of a long life are extremely good. The true explanation of this is declared to be the fact that deafness saves people a lot of worry over small matters and from the wear and tear of noises.

Bronchitis often shortens life, but in some cases it has the opposite effect. A large number of the old people one meets cough all the year round with chronic bronchitis. One would think to listen to them that they must cough themselves to death soon, but that is not so. The coughing helps the heart to circulate the blood, and, in fact, gives exercise to many of the organs. Only for this daily exercise many old people's mechanism would get fatally clogged. Besides, a man with bronchitis will not sit in a draught, he will avoid getting wet and will not stay out half the night losing his sleep and "painting the town" with the "boys."

Perhaps the most surprising assertion is that disease in parents often confers long life on children. The contrary is believed, popularly, and no doubt there is some ground for the belief. Some time ago the British Medical association investigated the subject of old age. Taking 340 people aged from 80 to 90 years, they inquired into their family history. Here is the result:

There was cancer in 44 families; consumption in 65 families; gout in 20 families; rheumatism in 59 families; insanity in 13 families; apoplexy and paralysis in 42 families.

Thus there was a history of deadly diseases in the families of 253 of the old people. In 47 more families there was likewise some grave disease. And only 40 families were free, or said to be free, from those maladies which usually are supposed to be hereditary.

Homes of Royalty.

It is rumored in Great Britain that a royal residence is to be built in Ireland by the king. Queen Victoria, after her visit to Ireland last year, is said to have expressed a desire that in future some member of her family should visit Ireland every year, and King Edward is known to be intent on carrying out every wish of his mother, as far as known to him. It is considered probable that the king's only brother, the duke of Connaught, with the duchess, will spend a part of every year there, as they are greatly attached to the Irish people. The Irish return the feeling, especially as the duke bears an Irish title. They will have Clarence house as a London residence. The duke of Fife and the duchess (Princess Louise of Wales) prefer Scotland, as a rule, but a royal residence in London will be assigned to them. The duchess is not strong, and finds greater charm, it is said, in a quiet home life than in society. Father, mother and the little Ladies Duff are often to be seen at Brighton in a quiet part of the beach, playing with pebbles, spades and pails, like the most commonplace of citizens. —N. Y. Tribune.

Great Russian Canal Scheme.

An American engineer named Wilson and two Russian military engineers named Oschtschurski and Sarakowski have applied to the Russian government for a concession for constructing and maintaining a ship canal between the Caspian sea and the Black sea, says a St. Petersburg correspondent. According to the plans the canal is to be 560 kilometers in length and to cost 300,000,000 rubles. The minister of finance has gone into the scheme and referred it to the minister of communications, who will have to give his consent before the concession can be granted.—N. Y. Sun.

A Costly Funeral.

The most costly state funeral which has ever taken place was perhaps that of Alexander the Great. A round million was spent in laying Alexander to his rest. The body was placed in a coffin of gold, filled with costly aromatics, and a diadem was placed on the head. The funeral car was embellished with ornaments of pure gold, and its weight was so great that it took 84 mules more than a year to convey it from Babylon to Syria. — Chicago Chronicle.

GREAT WORKSHOPS OF VULCAN

Immensity of the Steel and Iron Industry in the City of Pittsburgh.

Writing of "The Center of the World of Steel," Waldon Fawcett, in Century, describes Pittsburgh and its environs as Vulcan's greatest workshop.

To the superficial tourist it is, perhaps, only the dirtiest city in America. To the Pittsburgher, who is gripped by the fascination of iron-making, and to all who look through his spectacles, it is still the dirtiest but also the most magnificent of cities. To this typical resident its clouded atmosphere is symbolic only of rush and dash and power and the accumulation of wealth with splendid rapidity. Pittsburgh, moreover, is secure in her position as the capital of the domain of iron and steel. Coal crops out of the hills at her back; great engineering projects are making of the river that passes her gates an improved highway of commerce; her railroads are multiplying; and, finally, her metal manufacturers, reaching out for foreign markets, have discovered that they can utilize the very cars which bring iron ore back to the lakes the finished product, and there ship it through the St. Lawrence river direct to the ports on the other side of the Atlantic.

The great product of the Pittsburgh district in this present age is, strictly speaking, not iron, but steel. As a commercial commodity, the one has largely displaced the other. There are, to be sure, in almost every city foundries which handle only the metal which was once preeminent in the manufacturing world, but rails for steam and electric lines, beams for ships and sky-scrapers, armor-plate for war vessels, and heavy supports for bridges—in fact, all the commodities which may be produced profitably in large quantities—are formed of steel, and thus the product of nearly all the great plants in this crowded district reaches the consuming world in the form of the tougher and more elastic metals. Pittsburgh sends from her freight yards and docks each year millions of tons of this valuable material; enough, indeed, to fill a line of freight cars extending across the Atlantic, if such a thing were possible, and forming a stock in trade representing more money than the United States government receives in revenue from all sources within a year.

Although many of the immense iron and steel-making plants which surround Pittsburgh and constitute her modern defenses are under one general management, each institution is complete in itself. On the map the names Braddock, Bessemer, Rankin, Duquesne, Homestead and Munhall stand only for suburbs of the Iron city. Each, however, forms an important link in the chain of monster plants which stretches up the valley of the Monongahela, zigzagging back and forth across the river. These great establishments are not duplicates of one another, by any means, and yet, to a certain extent, the difference is only in detail. The rapid and thrillingly picturesque evolution of steel from iron ore may be watched in almost any one of them. The strands of burning metal, after having been pounded and pressed and rolled, may be measured off for the market as rails, sheets, boiler-plates, or any other of a score of forms, but the genesis of all is the same.

KING EDWARD'S HUMOR.

England's New Sovereign Enjoys a Joke as Well as Other People.

King Edward of England is a merry monarch. At least he was reputed to be merry before he attained his present august dignity.

Some years ago, when Arthur Roberts was singing his song "We are a merry family, we are, we are, we are!" the prince was asked for the solution of a knotty point. He merely shrugged his shoulders and said: "We are a royal family, V. R., V. R., V. R.!"

He was at the theater one night watching the famous Fletcher playing "Robert Macaire." The adventurer's coat was apparently a mass of rents and patches, but the prince's keen eye quickly noted that the garment was singularly well cut. After the play the prince sent for Fecher and asked him who his tailor was. The actor replied that Mr. Poole had made the coat he was wearing. The next day the prince sent for the tailor, who from that hour was a made man.

All the world knows that both the carriage and saddle horses of the prince of Wales have as part of their equipment a forehead band of the color known as royal scarlet. When the prince and his daughters ride in Hyde park their horses are, therefore, distinguished from those of other people by these particular forehead bands. One morning the horses of a certain financier and his two daughters were conspicuously adorned with red bands that are by etiquette reserved for the use of royalty. The prince and the young princesses, who were riding in the row, could not help noticing this vulgarity. On the following day it was seen that the prince had replaced his scarlet forehead bands by others of plain black leather, and the financier and his daughters had it all their own way in the matter of royal red.

WHAT THE TRAIN CRIER SAID.

It Relieved Four Frightened Parents and They Went Home Happy.

There was an excursion on one of the railroads a few days ago to a town in the center of the state. Two young women who went on the excursion missed the return excursion train to Chicago and stood around in the deserted depot of the country town in despair, says the Chicago Tribune.

"You see," said one young woman, "our fathers and mothers will be at the depot in Chicago when the train comes in and they will be frightened to death when we fail to arrive with the other excursionists. They will think all manner of bad things have happened to us. But what can de do?"

"Yes," said the other young woman through her tears, "if our people were at home this evening we might telegraph them, but they were all going downtown to the theater and I don't know what theater they went to. After the theater they were going down to meet us at the train. They will be simply frightened to death, and I'm afraid my father will get on the next train and come right down here after us. There are 700 or 800 people on that excursion train and there will be more than that number waiting for them at the depot, besides the crowds going out on the other trains, so it won't do any good for us to address our message to the depot. They would never get it."

"I know what to do," suddenly exclaimed the other young woman, as her face shone with the light of a brilliant inspiration.

"What?" gasped her companion.

"We will send a message to the train caller at the depot in Chicago and ask him to announce when the excursion train pulls in that we missed the train but are safe with friends here and will return on the first train to-morrow morning."

"O, that's just the thing," exclaimed the other maiden, and they hastily fixed up a telegram and sent it addressed to the train caller at the station.

So when the excursion train pulled into the Chicago depot that night the excursionists and the friends waiting for them were surprised to see the train caller clamber up on a bench, and in his most stentorian tones gravely announce:

"Limited train for St. Louis on third track. Cannonball for Toledo, Cleveland, Philadelphia and the east on first track. Miss Lillian Belleville and Miss Eugenia Thompkins missed the excursion train at Bloomfield and will spend the night with their relatives there, Mr. and Mrs. John Adams and Mr. and Mrs. Phil Allen. The young women are safe and happy and will return on the first train to-morrow morning. Passengers for Madison, St. Paul, Minneapolis and the northwest this way."

And four frightened parents breathed easy again and went home happy.

Warmed Over Tongue.

Cut cold tongue into small dice, and if there be any portions near the root that do not seem perfectly tender remove the fat and stew them in water to cover until tender, then add the better portions and any of the made gravy that may be left; or, if this be lacking, you may thicken the water in which the tongue has been stewed, and season it highly with lemon juice, Worcestershire sauce or catsup; heap mashed and seasoned potato round the edge of a platter and pour the warmed tongue into the center.—People's Home Journal.

A GLORIOUS SIGHT.

Fields of Wheat in Which the Stocks Were So Thick It Was Impossible to Drive Between Them.

To the Editor:

A gentleman from Duluth made a trip through a portion of Western Canada last summer, and writing of what he saw, says:

"Wheat, for instance, will average twenty-five or thirty bushels to the acre. I saw shocks so thick in the field that it would be almost impossible to drive between them. Winters, it is said, are longer than near Duluth, but the Japan current, warm chinook winds and dry atmosphere make the winters comparatively mild."

Thousands of such testimonies are to be had from settlers who have taken advantage of the low-priced lands of Western Canada. During the present year new districts will be opened up in the Saskatchewan Valley, and advantage should be taken of this at once. Information can be had from any agent of the Government, whose advertisement appears elsewhere in your columns.

All Astonished.

If people are too conservative they are very apt to find cause for astonishment when some person they have overlooked does something worthy of praise, or some familiar medicine effects a great cure. Such was the fact in the case of Mr. Nimrod Price of Milford, Ohio, who wrote: "My wife, myself, and all our neighbors are astonished at the wonderful effects of your Lotion in curing a distressing eruption on my wife's face, it having done what no doctor, or other medicine, had done before." If your druggist hasn't it, send to Solon Palmer, 374 Pearl St., New York, for sample of Palmer's Lotion and Lotion Soap.

Help for Women

Who Are Always Tired.

"I do not feel very well, I am so tired all the time."

You hear these words every day; as often as you meet your friends just so often are these words repeated. More than likely you speak the same significant words yourself, and no doubt you do feel far from well most of the time.

Mrs. Ella Rice, of Chelsea, Wis., whose portrait we publish, writes that she suffered for two years with bearing-down pains, headache, backache, and had all kinds of miserable feelings, all of which was caused by falling and inflammation of the womb, and after doctoring with physicians and numerous medicines she was entirely cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

MRS. ELLA RICE.

If you are troubled with pains, fainting spells, depression of spirits, reluctance to go anywhere, headache, backache, and always tired, please remember that there is an absolute remedy which will relieve you of your suffering as it did Mrs. Rice. Proof is monumental that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the greatest medicine for suffering women.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, June 25.—The President's cabinet did not again take up the question of Russian petroleum and the retaliation of that country against goods of the United States today at its brief meeting. The government will await the result of the representations that were made in the note recently addressed to Russia by Secretary Hay, giving fully the position of the United States. Late newspaper dispatches from Russia show that Russian officials, Mr. De Witte possibly included, are laboring under a great misapprehension of the powers of this country in the enforcement of its tariff laws. Secretary Gage does not care to let the newspaper dispatches affect his actions or views. The last one from Russia practically stated that Minister De Witte did not recognize Mr. Gage's interpretation of the Dingley act as the correct one. Another dispatch says that the Russian government would like to see Secretary Hitchcock consulted about the matter, and as he is believed to be friendly to Russia. Mr. Hitchcock was the ambassador of this country to Russia about three years ago. Secretary Hitchcock at the last cabinet meeting acted with the other members in thoroughly approving the course that had been taken by Secretary Gage.

A story has been printed from New York that a young Mr. Curtis, a nephew of Mr. Seth Low, has discovered an old act of Congress that clearly recognizes a difference in the legal status between the territories of this country "and the countries subject to the jurisdiction of the United States."

The story has gone the rounds until it has assumed some importance. Mr. Low is said to have written to the President calling attention to the alleged new discovery which, it was claimed, would probably have resulted in a unanimous decision of the Supreme Court in favor of the United States in the Porto Rican cases had its provisions been known to the court. Attorney General Knox looked the matter up and told the cabinet that the law referred to had been quoted fully in the arguments of Attorney General Griggs before the court and would be found on page 318 of the printed arguments in the insular cases. Not only did Mr. Griggs dwell upon the act, but Justice Brown referred to it in his decision. The act is that of March 27, 1804, and was supplemental to an act of 1790, relating to the records of the states and territories. The expression "and the countries subject to the jurisdiction of the United States" occurs in the act.

Secretary Gage has received from Charles E. Sapp, collector of internal revenue of the Louisville, Ky., district, a voluminous reply to the charges made more than a year ago by the civil service commission of the violation of civil service laws by Mr. Sapp. The answer will be sent to the civil service commission. Mr. Sapp's answer, it is understood, is not satisfactory to Secretary Gage, being written in a spirit that the secretary does not approve.

Mrs. McKinley went out for a drive this morning, accompanied by the President and Dr. Rixey. It was intended that the trip should be a short one, but Mrs. McKinley stood it so well and enjoyed it so much that the time was extended to fifty minutes. The drive was over a portion of the residence district of the city and into the suburbs. Where the streets were not smooth the horses were driven slowly. Dr. Rixey said afterward that Mrs. McKinley had apparently been benefited by getting out. Although the day was warm, she showed no fatigue. A closed carriage was used, and it was driven to the east basement entrance, where Mrs. McKinley was assisted in and out.

Mrs. McKinley daily shows improvement, and if there is no backset she will be able to travel to Canton next week. The date for the departure of the President and Mrs. McKinley has not been fixed.

It is now believed that Mrs. McKinley will be well enough in a month or so to go to the Buffalo Exposition. The President is going to Buffalo when Mrs. McKinley has recovered, and will probably take her with him.

They will go from Canton, where they will spend the summer.

The claim, amounting in the aggregate to 400,000 taels, reported to have been preferred by the Chinese Merchants' Association on account of alleged looting by the American marines at Tien Tsin will be referred to the military authorities for report. So far it has not been presented to the State Department. Gen. Heywood, the commandant of marines, is indignant at the reported intention to prefer this claim, and he cites a telegraphic report from Admiral Remey, dated sometime ago, upon the general subject of looting, containing the most specific denial of the allegations so far as any of the United States marines were concerned. The fact that the marines were the first to occupy that quarter of the town is probably the basis for the claim, for they would naturally be charged with the looting by the retreating Chinese, a practice which is known to have been general among them.

In order to facilitate the work of the census bureau a plan will soon be put into effect whereby clerks who desire to do so may work an hour and a half extra daily. The regular hours are now from 9 a. m. until 4 p. m., but clerks will be allowed to go to work at 8 a. m, and continue until 4.30 p. m., for which additional pay will be given. This extra time will make thirty-nine extra hours of work monthly. The director of the census is anxious to have his reports in readiness for Congress in as complete form as possible, and while the work of the bureau is not behind hand, compared with former years, it is not as far advanced as desired by Mr. Merriam.

ABOUT GOOD ROADS.

The Importance of Ditches or Other Drains Emphasized.

A recent issue of The Hub, a trade journal devoted to carriage building says, regarding road improvements: "It is hardly saying too much to assert that the three great principles of building good roads may be summed up in three words: 'Drainage, drainage, drainage.' There is no enemy of good roads so ubiquitious, so insidious, so persistent and so fatal in its doings as water. If moisture can penetrate a road surface or work in under a roadbed from its sides or in any way percolate to its foundations, then that road is not properly drained and built, and sooner or later (generally much 'sooner') it will get muddy, wear into ruts, need constant repairs, and be a source of dissatisfaction and expense. No other one thing does so much to injure a road as does water; not even narrow tires, for those are sometimes changed by thoughtful people of their own accord, and some are displaced by legislation; but rain, like death and taxes, is sure to come, and is certain to do harm unless carried away by a system of thorough drainage. If such a system is not provided a smooth, compact, well wearing road surface cannot be maintained; mud and ruts will appear in summer and frost will break up and ruin the road in the spring.

"Roads should also be so laid out that no water can find its way upon them from adjoining lands which may be higher, and which tend to shed the rainfall toward the roadways. To prevent this the ditches on either side of the road must be of ample capacity to carry off any rain that may fall. It not infrequently happens, too, that one side of a road is higher than the other, and that, at some point, the water from the higher side flows across the roadway and maintains a perpetual mudhole where it crosses. Every heavy storm furnishes a more or less startling object lesson on these points, for ditches overflow upon roads, and water from the higher side floods the surface and necessitates heavy expenditures for the repairs.

"The function of the road surface is that of a roof, whose purpose is to keep the base dry by shedding all water which falls upon it, and it cannot do this if it is not, among other things, so graded and shaped as to permit water to readily run off, so kept in repair as to have always a smooth and even surface, and so thoroughly drained as to carry away all water without overflow. The side ditches should have a fall throughout their length, and their size should depend upon the maximum volume of water they are likely to be called to carry. They should always be kept clean and free from obstructions, and if the water cuts their bottom the channel should be protected by paving it in some way.

"It sometimes happens that it is impossible to make open ditches deep enough to drain the center of the roadbed, and when this is the case it is necessary to use side or central drains. In a macadam road the foundation course should be somewhat porous so that if any rain works down from the road surfaces or finds its way in from the sides it may be able to reach the drains and be led off by them. A drain of four inch earthen pipe placed beneath each gutter at a depth of three and one-half feet below the crown of the road, and covered with broken stone, course gravel or pebbles nearly up to the surface, should be used and will generally prove sufficient; but if the road lies in a very wet place it will be better to locate a larger drain under the center of the road. In all cases a slight fall must be provided for and a free open outlet must be maintained

Unnecessary Loss of Time.

Mr. W. S. Whedon, Cashier of the First National Bank of Winterset, Iowa, in a recent letter gives some experience with a carpenter in his employ, that will be of value to other mechanics. He says: "I had a carpenter working for me who was obliged to stop work for several days on account of diarrhoea. I mentioned to him that I had been similarly troubled and that Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy had cured me. He bought a bottle of it from the druggist here and informed me that one dose cured him, and he is again at his work." For sale by all dealers.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 25. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JULY 4, 1901. NUMBER 17.

REPUBLICAN CONVENTION

Held In Oakland Tuesday and Ticket Nominated.

IT IS CONSIDERED A VERY STRONG ONE

The Gathering Composed of Represnetative Republicans From All Sections of the County. Nothing Occurred to Mar the Harmony of the Convention. Resolutions Passed.

Tuesday of this week was a field day for the Republicans of Garrett county. Representatives of that party were in Oakland in force and nominated probably the strongest ticket ever placed before the citizens of Garrett county for their suffrage. The work of the convention did not, however, terminate with the nomination of the several candidates, as a new State Central Committee was elected and also representatives to attend the State Convention to be held in Baltimore on August 2nd.

Every district in the county was represented by delegations composed of five persons, and the manner in which they disposed of their duties and transacted the business which brought them to Oakland has been very favorably commented upon by a number of people. The delegations from the several districts were as follows:

No. 1.—W. W. Sweet, A. F. George, L. H. Friend, Louis Littman, A. Wilson.

No. 2.—F. G. Fox. Arthur Chisholm, C. W. Friend, Wm. M. Hollinger, Nathan L. Selby.

No. 3.—Peter J. Stephens, Ralph Engle, Thomas H. Bittinger, Augustus Durst, Frank J. Folk.

No. 4.—Dr. H. M. Kemp, Jacob Stump, Grant Hershberger, Floyd Duckworth, A. C. Howard.

The work of the convention was practically done in the caucus, where a committee composed of fourteen members of the convention was elected to draft resolutions, and where the nominations were agreed upon and later ratified in open convention. The committee on resolutions reported the following, endorsing the administration of President McKinley and the course pursued by Senator McComas and Congressman Pearre, and in terms that cannot be gainsaid, condemned the State administration of Governor Smith and the Democratic members of the Maryland Legislature:

The Republicans of Garrett county, in convention assembled, do reaffirm our allegiance, loyalty and devotion to the party of patriotism, progress, protection, sound money and equal rights to all citizens of this favored land; we stand by the party, which in the face of all opposition, has stood by the union and the flag and has brought this nation to the forefront of commercial and industrial progress, and has elevated it to an honored position among the first nations of the earth.

We endorse the wise and patriotic course of President McKinley and his advisors in dealing with the intricate and complex questions that have confronted them in the discharge of their official duties.

We endorse the actions of Hon. Lewis E. McComas, United States Senator, and Hon. George A. Pearre, our representative in Congress, in the course pursued by them, and the positions taken on all great public questions, and for their fidelity and devotion to the best interest of the country at large, and especially of our own State people.

We endorse the course pursued by the members of the last Legislature from this county and especially their efforts at the extra session to preserve the franchise to some of our worthy but unfortunate citizens, and their efforts to prevent the enactment of vicious legislation.

We desire to commend the faithful discharge by our county officials of their duties and especially those having charge of our finances. Liberal appropriations have been made by the present Board of County Commissioners for all needs of the county; our tax rate has been reduced from year to year until now it is one of the lowest tax rates in the State.

We place our seal of condemnation upon the partisan State administration of Honorable John Walter Smith, Governor of Maryland, and brand it as one of the most extravagant, unpatriotic, unbusinesslike and less productive of good results than any administration that this State has experienced for years. Especially do we condemn his course in the calling of an extra session of the State Legislature, which had but one object in view, and that the disfranchisement of a number of citizens of this Commonwealth in order that ring-rule might again throttle the State and elevate Arthur P. Gorman to the United States Senate; our public school system has been pluuged into politics; our people have been denied the right to select by ballot, who should administer the same; the system has been less efficient and as a result our children are not receiving the schooling or enjoying the educational opportunities that the expenditures on the part of the county and State warrant. Many thousand dollars of the peoples' money has been recklessly spent in making a State census for which there was no necessity or demand and which fails to have the confidence of our people, owing to the partisan manner in which it was conducted.

Shortly after the committee's report on resolutions had been read and adopted, nominations were called for by the President of the caucus, Merritt Wilson, Esq., of District No. 8. Mr. William W. Sweet was the secretary.

Senator Ravenscroft, Capt. James A. Hayden and Capt. James W. White were nominated. But one ballot was taken, resulting as follows: Ravenscroft, 8; Hayden, 3; White, 3. Senator Ravenscroft was declared the choice of the caucus and his nomination was then made unanimous.

For House of Delegates, Hon. P. E. Finzel, of No. 9, and Chas. A. Ashby, of No. 14, were chosen.

Sheriff, William A. Maffett, of No. 6.

Treasurer, James W. White, of No. 14.

County Commissioners, Taylor Friend, of No. 2, and Jacob Stump, of No. 4.

Register of Wills, Edwin E. Friend, of No. 7.

County Surveyor, Franklin P. Green, of No. 11.

The new State Central Committee was then elected as follows: Dr. J. W. Laughlin, of No. 10; Charles E. Hilleary, of No. 8, and Thomas H. Bittinger, of No. 3.

Delegates to the State Convention, Fred. A. Thayer, U. G. Palmer and G. W. Kitzmiller.

The work of the caucus having been completed the convention was then called to order and the caucus nominees ratified in open convention.

Capt. James W. White, of District No. 8, addressed the convention for a few moments declaring that although he was a defeated candidate for Senatorial honors he was nevertheless a Republican and declared his intention of heartily supporting the ticket, advising all others whose aspirations were not realized to do the same. His words were well timed and made a good impression on the convention.

Cure For Cholera Infantum—Never Known to Fail.

During last May an infant child of our neighbor was suffering from cholera infantum. The doctors had given up all hopes of recovery. I took a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy to the house, telling them I felt sure it would do good if used according to directions. In two days time the child had fully recovered. The child is now vigorous and healthy. I have recommended this remedy frequently and have never known it to fail.—Mrs. Curtis Baker, Bookwalter, Ohio. Obituary.

Harriet Collier DeWitt, wife of John DeWitt near Hoyes, Md., passed from labor to her reward June 26, 1901, at the ripe age of 69 years. She had a stroke of paralysis which resulted in death in a few hours afterward. Sister DeWitt was a member of the M. E. church about fifty years and gave evidence of her acceptance with God many times during life and especially so in her last moments on earth. The deceased has four children living, and among that number is Prof. A. W. DeWitt, who is so favorably and widely known in this county and Allegany.

The funeral services were conducted by the pastor, Rev. D. A. Friend, and the remains were placed in Hoye cemetery by the side of several of the DeWitt families, awaiting the Resurrection.

The mourning friends have our deepest sympathies, and commend them to Jesus the Great Sympathizer.

CORKSCREW PHILOSOPHY.

Hope may be defined as gilt edged uncertainty.

Law is uncertainty made more uncertain—the final court has the last guess.

Marriage—a preliminary step to procuring a divorce—a gold brick scheme worked by both parties.

The bribe taking citizen in a greater menace than the illiterate voter; the one may mend; the other is past redemption.

If the illiterate citizen is to be deprived of his ballot the non-producing citizen should be barred also. Only they who build a State should be allowed to govern it.

He who minding his own business neglects public affairs is blind to his own good. What concerns all should concern every good citizen.

Business is booming in the cannon trade, competitions very keen in the razor shops and a big drop in the shot works. The farmers are letting their business go to grass, and the dairymen are skimming the cream of the trade. The clock works are running on full time and the balloon trade is going up with a rush. About the Fourth of July there will be a bust up in the fire-works trade but the business in fans will be on the spread. The corset makers are stiffening up for a longer stay in their line of trade, while the shoe-makers have a good thing on foot while it lasts. The outlook for the spectacle makers is very good and the umbrella makers claim to be under cover in case of a financial storm. There is somewhat of a squeeze in the lemon trade but molasses is running off freer since warmer weather.

THE RACE FREE FOR ALL.

Many Able Republicans Mentioned for Maryland United States Senatorship.

If the Republicans succeed in electing a majority of the representatives to the Maryland legislature an interesting contest for the United States senatorial nomination will undoubtedly follow.

No one candidate has yet the inside track. It is a free-for-all, and every entry has an equal chance. Up to date the names of Phillips Lee Goldsborough, Congressman William H. Jackson, Ex-Governor Lloyd Lowndes and State Senator Stevenson A. Williams have been mentioned. Each of these has devoted friends who will urge their candidates claims in caucus. Nor has any one any reason to underestimate the strength of his opponents. Some arrangement will probably be entered into by Messrs. Goldsborough and Jackson which will enable the Eastern Shoremen to line up solidly behind a candidate for their section. The same may be said of Western Maryland, as represented by ex-Governor Lowndes and Mr. Williams. Mr. Mudd's name has been mentioned, but one of his warm personal friends who was in the city during the week said he was out of the running, but could bring 22 votes from Southern Maryland which would be cast for the most available candidate. Baltimore city is still to be heard from, but at the proper time the local delegation may also present the claims of a favorite son. There are quite a number of leading party men who would like to see Judge Stockbridge honored with the nomination.

Much depends, of course, upon the representation from the particular sections in which the respective candidates reside. Those having the largest following need not necessarily have the best chance of winning, but they can, should they themselves be unable to corral the nomination, name the winner. At this writing it would appear that the Eastern Shore and Western Maryland will fight it out.

The Harford county Republicans are playing the finest politics witnessed in this State in many years. The county is normally Democratic, and, with a popular candidate like Ex-Senator Robinson at the head of the ticket, it looked easy for the Democrats. But the Republicans are planning a coup, the announcement of which jarred their opponents. They propose to instruct their legislative delegates, if elected, to vote for State Senator Stevenson A. Williams for United States Senator. There is no citizen of Harford more popular than Mr. Williams. He numbers among his friends and admirers many Democrats who believe that in honoring him they honor the county. His popularity was evidenced in his election to the State Senate when he was the only Republican on the ticket to be elected.

Should the contest narrow down to the Eastern Shore favorite and Mr. Williams, the latter would, in case Harford went Republican, stand an excellent chance of being nominated. Senator McComas openly stated during the week that he had no preference, nor had ever expressed himself as favoring any one candidate. He said he was interested in the success of the party and wanted above everything to see elected a Republican legislature. This would insure the return of a Republican to the United States Senate.

All efforts to make it appear that the Republicans in Baltimore are disorganized are apparently unavailing.

Several politicians who have lost caste, are endeavoring to spread this impression, but as they are well known, those whom their utterances are intended to influence take little or no stock in the published statements.

Of the 14 wards in which contests are expected, in only three is there any bitterness manifested, and the party leaders expect this feeling to die out long before the election takes place. As has been repeatedly stated there are no factional alignments. The fights are entirely personal, Malster and Union League men being divided in their preferences. There may be an extremely bitter contest in the Third ward, where Marshal Airey holds forth, but this is entirely due to the unpopularity of the marshal. The latter, however, has a decided advantage because the opposition has not concentrated upon any particular candidate, the different would be leaders being jealous of each other. With the exception of this ward, and posibly the Fifth, Nineteenth and Twenty-first, the best of feeling prevails throughout the city.

With the view of gaining the good will of the State leaders some of the politicians who are looking out for themselves called upon Senator McComas early last week and volunteered to espouse the cause of any of of those he will name. To all of these the Senator replied he had no choice, nor would he so state, even if he had He said further that he did not propose to interfere in any local contest nor offer any suggestion except in his own county.

As an evidence of this determination the Senator proposes to take three weeks' vacation, beginning Tuesday, when he will go North and spend some time at the Buffalo Exposition. As the primaries and conventions will take place during his absence he cannot be charged with taking any part directly or indirectly.

Mr. Goldsborough feels about this matter just as does the Senator. He says all of his spare time will be taken in looking after affairs in his own county, in which he is particularly interested.

About the only thing the State leaders are impressing on city as well as county leaders is the advisability, indeed the necessity, of making first class nominations if they hope to win.

The "Hot Enough" Man.

Behold, there arose in the land a man of marvelous intellect, and with much pleasantness as to conversation.

And he went here and there, and on the side streets, also, and asked of those whom he met:

"Is it hot enough for you?"

Now, at this time the thing that is called the thermometer and a large number of bad names, likewise was getting on itself a hump.

It was even going unto the top of itself and looking out upon the roof.

It was higher than Standard Oil stock and had more buoyancy than a balloon.

So that they who looked upon it when it was elevated, were sore astounded.

And straightway they began moping their brows and drinking strange drinks and saying strong things.

And in the midst of this came the man.

He smiled with the smile of one who hath found a shekel by the wayside, and he said:

"Is it hot enough for you?"

And the man to whom he spake answered him not a word.

Yet again did he ask it of another man.

And the other man replied, "Umph!" which, being interpreted, meaneth a number of things.

And he continued on his way and asked of all he met if it was hot enough to please them.

Furthermore, he asked a few women, also.

But what can a woman say that would fit the case?

So the women gazed at him as they would look at the man who had stepped upon the back breadths of their garments.

Or had sat upon their new bonnets in a moment of frivolity.

Now, the man with the warm intellect thought well of himself.

Yea, he held converse with himself, saying: "Lo, I have a new one for them. Surely, it is bright and sparkling language to ask them if it is warm enough for them.

"Behold, when I ask them, they do not know what to answer."

"Verily, I shall ask them yet again."

And he went out and asked them some more.

Whereupon all the people rose as one man and went for him;

They fell upon him and smote him hip and thigh;

They gave him the lively swat across the vest with a thermometer and they administered a bung in the ear with a barometer;

They lammed him upon the eyebrow and they basted him against the jaw;

They sat upon him and walked about over his countenance;

They ran unto him and jumped against him and did divers other charming things to him.

Saying all the time:

"Yea, verily, kind sir, it is warm enough for us. Doth it grow sufficiently caloric to interest thee?"

But he answered them not, for he had gone away for the summer.

Yea, he passed out from this world, and when he arrived at the bottom of the elevator shaft, he was met by a committee of imps, who led him to the annealing department of the hereafter.

Where they placed him, singing in the time that is called rag, a song which had the words:

"Is it hot enough for you?"

Verily, it is not well to ask fool question.

For sometimes the answer cometh back collect. —JOSH WINK.

MID-SUMMER WEATHER.

According to the Forecast Made For July by Prof. Hicks.

A combination of astronomic events out of the ordinary falls on and about the opening of July. The opposition of the planet Jupiter—the world greater than all other planets and moons combined—falls on June 20th, and the opposition of Saturn, the next greatest planet, falls on July 5th. The full Moon, or Moon in opposition to Earth and Sun, and hence in conjunction with both Jupiter and Saturn, falls on July the 1st. The planets Venus and Mercury are, also, in conjunction with each other and the Earth on June 30th, with Earth and Mercury in aphelion, and Venus in perihelion. Such a balancing and lining up of worlds is not an ordinary occurrence, and to say what the results should be, in a meteorological way is not an entirely easy thing in our present state of knowledge.

Added to all the above, it must be kept in mind that we are still near the center of Jupiter equinox, and that a regular Vulcan storm period extends from the 1st to the 6th of July, winding up with Moon on the celestial equator on the 6th.

Ordinarily, we would name the 3rd, 4th and 5th as days of greatest storm danger, but under the unusual conditions prevailing, they are probable any time from 1st to 6th.

Reactionary storm conditions will exist on the 8th to 10th, continuing probably over the Moon's perigee on the 11th. Falling barometer, rising temperature and winds from east and south will precede the actual storms and precipitations of this and all other July periods.

The central storm period of July falls from the 13 to the 18th. The crisis of this period will fall from Sunday, the 14th, to Wednesday, the 18th.

Look out for rains over the interior parts of our country during the last half of July and the first half of August, is the presence of this Venus period. If sufficient humidity should not be present during the regular storm days in this Venus period, there is great probability of extreme heat and hot, withering winds, especially in the open, grain regions of the west and northwest.

Thunder gusts are always probable when the Moon passes the celestial equator in summer, the 16th of July being such a date.

The probability of rain and storms at this time is increased by the presence of a Mercury period, blended with that of Venus, central on the 26 and extending from the 21st to the 31st.

More or less rain with probable cloudbursts, hail and dangerous winds need not surprise anyone during the storm period which is central on the 26th. One of the warmest terms of the summer may be expected in connection with this period, and many storm clouds with severe thunder gusts will be natural about Thursday, the 25th, to Sunday, the 28th. Destructive hail storms are more than probable at this period, as well as at other periods within the Venus brace. The great heat probable at this time will break up the conclusion of the storms, and very cool nights for the season will follow in most parts of the country, especially in the northwest. If rains do not appear during the last ten days in July, the outlook for rain in the great western and northwestern grain regions is not encouraging for the rest of the summer and early autumn. The last two days of the month, with full Moon and Venus at the center of her disturbing period, are reactionary storm dates. On and touching these days the barometer, thermometer and wind currents will show a return of storm conditions.

DAD 'N' I.

Dad 'n' I are goin' fishin'.
Dad's a-diggin' bait;
I'll jes' tell you all about it.
If you'll set 'n' wait.
Dad's an awful hand fer fishin'—
I'm his right-hand bower,
Like to set 'n' watch the bobber
Hour after hour.

Like to hear the waves come sloppin'—
Lappin' soft and low,
Like to see the sunlight glancin'
Dancin' to an' fro.
Like to feel the line a-pullin'
Steddy, sure an' strong.
Always feel so glad 'n' happy
Thinkin' I'm along.

Ain't pertickler what we're ketchin',
Long's we get a bite;
Bass or sunfish, perch er pickrel,
Bullhead, eel er pike.
Nothin' but a snappin' turkle
Goes against the grain,
When he gobbles up yer hook an'
Wears yer line off fer a train.

'N' when the shadders get to growin'
Long 'n' slender on the grass,
Dad 'n' I'll pick up our tackle
'N' string o' perch 'n' speckled bass,
'N' mosey 'long up thro' the clover
Thout a speck of any noise,
'N' ma'll be out a-watchin' fer us,
Sayin', "Supper's waitin', boys."

A KENITE'S WIFE

By S. E. Bealt.

(Copyright, 1901, by Authors Syndicate.)

MAVERICK'S sail came slipping down the creek in the hour before dawn. There was an arc of growing light in the east with Jupiter shining white above.

He had been to the county town to try to raise money on his last bit of land, of which the waves were making an island before blotting it out altogether.

When estates were to be had for the asking, the first Maverick could go 20 miles on his own domain. He built the church of St. Deny's, B & M, that is still standing, and gave the glebe lands; he abhorred a Puritan, upheld the authority of the king and the lord proprietary, signed his name with a cross, and left to his articled servant, Haines, such unmanly employment as reading and writing. Master and man lived in 1640, before the men from Nansemond made trouble in camp and state. After 1776, a Maverick of the fourth generation was a loyalist impoverished by a patriotic Haines, who through cleverness at statecraft had come to a responsible position, and who had married the daughter of a colonial dignitary. In marriage a Haines had ever a taste for alliance with his betters; several spinster brides had aided their rising fortunes with the influence of a name.

The matrimonial ventures of a Maverick were brought about by the attraction of the moment. A milkmaid, or a girl from a wayside inn made a charming bride, providing she had the beauty and brilliance of youth.

Haines' statesmanship of the present day had narrowed to county politicsand a controlling hand over lucrative offices; while Maverick earned a scant living from the water and from the few acres he had left. Something more by inheritance still remained to him—a contempt for books, two tankards with well-worn thumb pieces, a superstitious reverence for the hospitality of his poor house, and an unimpaired hatred of a Haines.

He kept a careless hand on the tiller, and went over the news he had heard in town: Haines, who was county treasurer, had defaulted. His political opponents were in power, even the judges on the bench were against him; he was a fugitive, with the certainty of a vigorous justice before him. He might have got out of the country if he had not risked his freedom for the sake of a sick child, a son whom he dearly loved.

Maverick recalled the tax gatherer's petty persecutions over his own insignificant tithe. He summed up an account of generations, and laughed at the result.

As his keel dragged the sand, his wife ran down through the half light to the edge of the water. She was small and very young, and she ran on tiptoe, beating the air with her hands as if buoying her movements. Eagerness shone in her eyes and in the trembling of her compressed lips. He had married after the custom of his people, and in her he worshiped youth and beauty in the concrete.

She pushed him away and turned from his kiss to ask:

"Did the man let you have the money?"

"No."

She skipped from one foot to the other:

"I've got it. I can do better'n you by staying home."

"What?"

"I've got the money. Hurry up."

Maverick made the boat fast, and rumaged in the locker for his purchases.

"What difference does it make about the old boat? Hurry, hurry."

He awkwardly untied a package and held a red ribbon and some mint sticks above her head.

"What'll you give for them?"

"Here," she said, impatiently, and lifted her face to kiss him. "Don't you see the sun'll be up in less than an hour? Come up to the house. There's the money for the mortgage on the room floor."

He followed her up the path. She signed to him to walk softly and he imitated her light motions. The inner door was ajar, and as he peered into the dusky place he saw, first, familiar things that had been associated with him for 50 years, a picture, an oaken settee and the two old tankards, which the girl beside him had kept brightly polished to while away her time. Afterward, in the lane of light, he saw a bowl and a plate with some crumbs of bread upon it. The shadow across the hearth was the fugitive treasurer. His clothes were torn and his shoes were broken. His narrow face, with the growth of a week's beard, was hidden on his arm, and his clerkly hands lay out on the floor where he had stretched them in the expectation of sleep. He slept securely; their voices did not disturb him.

"Do you know who he is?"

"Nancy Garry rowed over last night an' told me about a man that had been stealin' money; he'd been tracked down this way an' the sheriff was follerin' him."

"When did he come?"

"About 12. When I come up from the landin' seein' Nancy Garry off he was standin' in the porch, an' he asked me if I'd let him lay down there. I knew him. I told him he could lay down on the floor of the room, an' I fetched him bread an' milk—good milk—an' I said you wouldn't be home till next day. He didn't know this was your house, an' he asked me if I was your daughter." She pointed to the key in the lock. "The shutters was fastened on the outside. From what Nancy Garry said, I reckon the sher'ff'll be down the road about sunup or a little after. I'll signal him from our side and—there's the mortgage. He'll give $300 for him."

Her eyes danced; the bosom of her dress rose and fell with her quick breathing. Maverick looked through the door at the treasurer.

"It's Haines, ain't it?" whispered the girl. She shook his sleeve impatiently. "I thought you'd be glad."

He kept hold of her hand and drew her out on the porch. He had treated her like a child, and she had flattered him with an indulgent domination that is shown to the very young and the very old.

"Ain't you glad?" she persisted. "If Nancy Garry'd caught him you'd be glad."

"Maybe; but not to trap him in our own house, if he's a hundred times a Haines."

"After all his letters an' threats; an' all you tell me about his people an' your people when they was worth something?"

"Never mind," he said, sharply. 'Listen; when I get down to the turn, you wake him up, give him some bread and tell him what you know about the sher'ff—tell him all you know. Do you hear? The far side of the creek'll serve him best. That's not mine; it never was. And tell him"—his anger mastered him—"by the power that made me, I'll hunt him like a hound as soon as his foot's on another man's land!"

MAVERICK MADE THE BOAT FAST.

Julie watched him enter the misty woods before she opened the cupboard and cut a piece of bread from the loaf; she looked at it critically and cut a smaller slice, which she carried to the inner room.

An hour after she met Maverick coming up from the highway. His hat was off, and the level sun shone on his worn face and on his gray hair. Julie thought he looked old.

"Did you see the sher'ff?"

"Yes."

"Well, it was a heap o' money, an' we might as well had it as anybody. It wasn't my fault."

She slipped her head under his arm and began to rifle his pockets of the red ribbons and the mint sticks; she forgot Haines.

Maverick, too, forgot Haines, and thought only of Julie; there had come the fear that, though they went hand in hand, nevertheless he went out of his paradise.

CONVERTED THE OLD BELL.

Priest's Explanation to a Presbyterian of How It Became Truly Consecrated.

For many years Father Boyle was one of the most prominent and popular Catholic clergymen in Washington, where he had a great reputation as a wit. Many of his most intimate friends were Protestants and members of the Protestant clergy. A few months before his death he erected a missionary chapel down by the navy yard and bought at a junk shop an old bell which had been discarded by one of the Presbyterian churches. He sent the bell to a foundry in Georgetown and had several inches of metal pared off the rim. Having thus got rid of a crack the harsh and discordant tones of the bell became short and sweet. Meeting a Presbyterian parson not long after, Father Boyle called his attention to the change and the latter could scarcely believe it was the same bell. "What in the world did you do with that bell?" inquired the Presbyterian pastor, "to cause such a change in the tone?" "We blessed it and blessed it until we got the Presbyterian devil out of it," retorted Father Boyle, "and then it sounded all right."

SHIP WITH A HISTORY.

Once the Vigilant Was a Pirate Ship and a Slaver, Now She Is an Honest Mail Ship.

Few persons, even those who are in the postal service, know that United States mail is carried in the oldest sailing vessel in the water to-day, and that the vessel has been a pirate ship and a slaver. Its name is the Vigilant, and it carries the mails from St. Croix to St. Thomas in the West Indies. In speed it compares favorably with many steamboats which carry the mails, and it can distance anything that is propelled by wind in any postal service.

The ship is of 40 tons burden, and is rigged as a fore and after, the same rig that was carried when the vessel was in the slave trade, and was cruising about the West Indies as a pirate. With a fair wind the Vigilant makes the 40-mile trip in a little more than three hours, and it can stand any sort of weather.

P. C. Pentheny, of St. Croix, owns the vessel and leases it for mail-carrying. He is proud of the fact that no schooner has ever beaten his boat. He got it from his father, who, in turn, bought it from an old native, whose father had used it with an English master in the slave trade.

The slaves were carried in the hold where the mail is thrown now. The vessel is 150 years old, and has had its back broken twice. This ceremony occurs every time a ship is condemned as a pirate or a slaver. The last sentence of the Vigilant was passed in 1823. The vessel was run ashore, where its keel was split in two. It was repaired and put in service again, and is now as good as ever.

DR. IRA C. REMSEN.

New President of Johns Hopkins University Is a Scholar of International Reputation.

Dr. Ira C. Remsen, the new president of Johns Hopkins university at Baltimore, has been a member of the faculty in that institution, chiefly in the chair of chemistry, since its foundation in 1876. When Dr. Gilman started out to build up a faculty Dr. Remsen was the first man to whom he tendered a chair. For 25 years he has been the confidant and adviser of Dr. Gilman, and he is regarded by both students and faculty as a thorough scholar and an able educator. All the time during which his famous predecessor was abroad Dr. Remsen was the acting president of Johns Hopkins. At 56 he is in the prime of his intellectual power. He is a graduate of the medical school of Columbia college, a post graduate of Munich and Goettingen (Ph. D.) and an authority in chemistry whose fame is international. Dr. Remsen has been several times tendered most tempting offers by the University of Chicago, but his love for Johns Hopkins has always prevented his acceptance. His election to the presidency is regarded as a fitting reward for his loyalty.

Have Reason to Feel Sore.

Kansas lawyers are grieved and indignant because some of the cattlemen are inclined to settle their disputes without resorting to the courts. The disputants choose three men as an arbitration committee, and the committee decides each case. Not long ago a case involving $60,000 was thus settled in Eureka, and not a dollar went to the lawyers. No wonder they tear their hair as they finger their empty pockets.

Swimmers in German Army.

To be acceptable as a soldier in the German army a man must be able to swim. The best swimmers are able to cross a stream of several hundred yards' width even when carrying their clothing, rifle and ammunition.

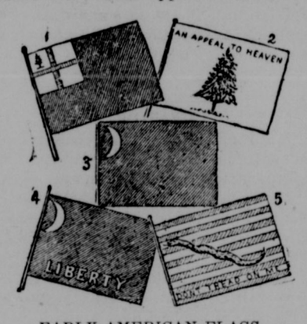
THE NATIONAL EMBLEM.

More Than Two Years of Revolutionary Warfare Without a Generally Recognized Flag.

A national ensign was not adopted till June, 1777. A glance at the promiscuous banners under which the different American forces campaigned during the first two years of the revolution will be found of interest.

The first great regular battle of the war was Bunker Hill. It is not likely that there were any colors carried by the few militiamen who were hastily got together at Concord and Lexington two months before. But after the skirmishes at these places each of the colonies set up its own flag. Unfortunately descriptions of these flags were not preserved, and the information we have is very vague.

The most definite information as to American flags we get is in foreign journals at ports where American ships at that time touched. There is no satisfactory information as to the standard used by the colonists at Bunker Hill, fought on June 17, 1775. Indeed it has never been proved that they had any standards, though one writer says "they were as various as the troops were motley." There is a picture of the battle in the rotunda of the capitol at Washington, painted by Trumbull, the celebrated American artist of that day, in which the Americans are pictured fighting under a red flag having a white canton bearing a green pine tree. Warren is said to have reminded his troops of the motto on their standard, on one side of which was, "Qui transtulit sustinet" (He who brought us here will sustain us), and on the other: "An Appeal to Heaven."



EARLY AMERICAN FLAGS.

This appears to have been the Connecticut motto. An old lady told Mr. Lossing, the historian, that her father was at the battle and assisted in hoisting the flag. He described it to her. The ground was blue with one corner quartered by the red cross of St. George, in one section of which was a pine tree.

On July 18, 1775, a standard was presented to Washington bearing the motto "An Appeal to Heaven." On October 20, 1775, a plan was suggested for a revolutionary flag, which was a white ground and a tree in the middle bearing the motto: "An Appeal to Heaven." It was the flag of American floating batteries. This was undoubtedly adopted by Massachusetts, and it was used on American ships.

CARRY WAR DISPATCHES.

When and Where Carrier Pigeons Are Used, and What They Are Capable of Doing.

"The New Popularity of the Carrier Pigeon," is the title of an article by George Ethelbert Walsh, which appears in St. Nicholas.

Both in war and peace the carrier-pigeon has won new laurels in the past year, and its popularity as a well-bred pet and domestic messenger has become as great as its usefulness as a carrier of war dispatches where telegraph and telephone lines are not established. That so innocent a creature as the dove-like carrier should be selected for important war purposes, and taken into the service for furthering the bloody conflicts of modern armies seems out of keeping with the aims of nature and an abuse of man's power. The pigeon is eminently a peace-loving bird and its nature is so different from that of the screaming eagle and falcon that as an emblem of war it should be a total failure. Nevertheless, the timid bird has served armies in times of need and is cultivated for its practical war usefulness to an extent never dreamed of for either the falcon or eagle. In a sense it is the war bird of the day.

The pigeon post at Durban, in South Africa, was the beginning of the pigeon experiments conducted in recent campaigns between the English and Boers, and scores of messages were carried from one part of the English army to another by means of the birds. Col. Hassard, of the Royal engineers, a staff officer at the Cape, had made a life study of the carrier-pigeons, and before the war broke out he had established pigeon posts between most of the beleaguered cities. From Ladysmith, Kimberley and Mafeking pigeons early in the sieges regularly brought messages from the English soldiers cooped up in the towns. Sir George White's first message from Ladysmith was carried by a pigeon, and this means of communicating with the outside world continued until the number of birds in the city was exhausted.

It was only a short time before the outbreak of the war in South Africa that the English government had decided to establish a service of carrier-pigeons. In the navy, pigeon posts were recognized means of carrying information as early as 1896, and there are over a thousand birds recorded on the books of the royal navy. The first naval loft was at Portsmouth and now there are two others. In the English army the posts have been confined almost exclusively to the Cape, where the nature of the country makes the homing-pigeon service of more value than in England.

The development of the war homing-pigeon service throughout Europe has been more rapid than elsewhere, and army posts support large numbers of them. Strict laws are made to protect those in private lofts. As a great military camp, Europe looks upon the carrier-pigeon as a menace to the country if not held under strict military control. In Germany, for instance, every pigeon raised by private breeders must be registered, and the pigeon cannot be taken out of the country or sold without permission from the military authorities. In the event of a war, the German authorities reserve the right to claim and take possession of every carrier-pigeon in the land. In addition to this, every fortress and camp on German soil has its pigeon service, and over $10,000 is appropriated annually for the support of this service. There are upwards of 10,000 pigeons belonging to the war department, and every bird is carefully trained and tested.

A BIRD WITH A RECORD.

The United States military and naval authorities have approved of the pigeons as aids to the regular telegraphic means of communication, and there are several posts established in the west and along the Atlantic coast. But on the whole this country depends more upon private breeders for its supply of carrier-pigeons than upon the birds already in the service of the army or navy. Our great distance by sea from all other powerful nations makes it unnecessary to arrange for the services of carrier-pigeons as the European countries have done. There is little chance of any foreign army invading this country and destroying the railroad and telegraph lines connecting the big cities. Pigeon breeding and training have therefore been carried on in the United States more in the interests of peace and pleasure. There are hundreds of enthusiastic owners in every state of the union, and probably in no country has the work of rearing the birds been attended to with greater intelligence and success.

STRANGE BIRD SCHOOL.

In Some Parts of Germany Bullfinches Are Taught to Sing Sweet Music by Machinery.

The story of the German bullfinch is a very sad one. In its native state it has a funny little chirrup, something like that of the English sparrow. It lives in the mountains, and there are strict laws against catching them or keeping them in cages. But many persons break these laws, and all over the empire are places where the bullfinch is trained to sing wonderful music. A finely educated bird can sing from six to twelve notes with perfect sweetness and as smoothly as the best human voice. Just after the little bird has come out of its shell it is taken into a dark room, and there it must stay until it is perfectly trained. It receives but little food, and is by the darkness and hunger made very lonely and nervous, so that when at length it hears the sweet tones of a harmonicon it is very much impressed and listens with all its might.

The instrument is run by machinery, and the air is played over and over again, and there is no other sound in the darkened chamber. After awhile the lonesome bird seems to awake, the vocal chords tremble, and a faint sound comes from the little creature. At first it is but a weak and feeble imitation, but again and again it tries the theme until at last it pours forth all its soul in a clear and perfect strain. And when this given air is learned it must try another, until sometimes four or five melodies are firmly fixed upon the brain or memory of the young bullfinch.

It Didn't Work That Way.

At the present day we cannot imagine how a railway could exist without a telegraph line alongside, yet it is a fact that when the telegraph was first introduced the railway opposed it. When it was contemplated to build a "magnetic telegraph" between New York and Philadelphia, permission was sought to erect poles along the tracks of the New Jersey railroad. This privilege, however, was refused, on the plea that the telegraph would be a financial rival of the railroad, in so far as it would enable people to transact business without traveling!

Impressed Upon His Notice.

The various features for which the Lackawanna Railroad has become noted are involuntarily impressed upon the notice of the passenger, who realizes the luxury of hotel or club appointment in the electric lights; the smooth-running journals of the wheels; the extraordinary cleanliness made possible by the use of anthracite coal, avoiding all dust and nauseating smoke; the consciousness of being always on time—which comforts force an ease of mind and body most favorable to the enjoyment of the unsurpassed scenery through which its lines pass. It is but the natural sequence that the Lackawanna is prosperous in like degree to its excellence of service, and its warm friends are equal in number to its whole list of patrons, for once to test its service means an ardent admirer and friend earned for the road.—Van Etten Breese.

Going Too Far.

"This reckless speculation must be stopped," said the earnest citizen to the trust magnate.

PRAYED TO ANIMALS.

Ancient Egyptians Worshiped Cows, Bulls and Cats.

They Also Venerated Serpents and Other Reptiles—Other Nations of Antiquity Imitated Their Example.

[Special Chicago Letter.]

WEBSTER says that religion is "any system of faith and worship." This is generally acknowledged to be an age of religions—but it would be too much to ask that a large proportion of the devotees of the various cults in vogue should have faith or belief in all the tenets of the sect to which they ardently attach themselves to-day, only to seek another to-morrow. They worship for many reasons, chiefest of which is, perhaps, that it pleases their selfhood to differ from average people who accept the beliefs to which they were born, and adhere to them. It would surprise the latter, probably, to know how many fire-worshipers and sun-worshipers there are right here in Chicago to-day. Divination, by consulting the stars, palmistry, omens and certain mysterious rites with which the uninitiated are but little familiar, are steadily becoming more popular.

While there is no doubt that the religious tendency of the age is toward higher spiritual development, the number of those who have revived and are practicing the religions of the ancients is by no means small. This has brought about a general interest in animal worship, the different forms of which are being studied on all sides, and present many curious features. Among primitive peoples animals are regarded as possessing souls which, in many instances, formerly animated human bodies. A likeness is recognized between the animal and some deceased friend, and the animal receives great honor. Here a distinct link is found between ancestor worship and animal worship. There are few well-known animals that have not in some time or place figured conspicuously in such ceremonies. The Egyptians worshiped cats, pied bulls, crocodiles, apes, serpents, and numberless other creatures. In fact, domestic cats are supposed to have originated in or near Egypt, for from the earliest times temples were erected in their honor and devotions offered to them. The family in whose house a cat died shaved their eyebrows.

A cat was supposed to symbolize the moon, which was accounted only less sacred than the sun. It was a capital offense to kill a cat in the land. When dead it was embalmed and usually buried in Bubastium, which sacred city was dedicated to the moon. Painted cats figured in the finest mural decorations. In the middle ages cats were supposed to be the familiars of witches, and in our own New England may still be heard (when the lights are low) blood-curdling stories of the achievements of old Mrs. M——, a well-known witch, and her familiar, and "it is a fact that when that old black cat came into the room our Jim caught him and put him into the fireplace, where he was held till he was dreadfully burned, when, with a terrible scream, he tore away and leaped through the window, breaking the glass, and no one could get into the old woman's house the next day. When an entrance was finally forced, Mrs. M—— was in bed with her face and whole body covered with deep burns and cuts."

If a cat cried on a house-top, it was considered a sure "forerunner" of death. In all ages the supposed attributes of cats have received a great deal of attention. In some lands they have been deeply venerated, while in others they have been regarded with extreme dread. Satan's favorite materialization was said to be the form of a black cat. Probably the favorite Egyptian animal was the sacred bull, Apis, worshiped with divine honors. It was regarded as a symbol of Osiris, god of the Nile, husband of Isis, and great divinity of Egypt. His residence was a sacred court in the temple of Ptah, at Memphis, where he was waited upon by priests. Oxen were sacrificed to him. His changes of appetite, choice of places, and all movements were religiously regarded as oracles. It was understood that he would not live more than 25 years, and if he reached that age the priests quietly disposed of him in a sacred well into which it was popularly believed that he had cast himself. If he died a natural death he was placed with great ceremony in the temple of Serapis, in Memphis.

At the inauguration of a new bull at Apis bacchanalian festivities were held. This animal must be black, with a white square on the brow, the figure of an eagle on the back and a knot under the tongue. His birthday and the day of his discovery were celebrated as high festivities. He was supposed to preside over agriculture. Decked with wreaths of flowers, and led by a priest, he was worshiped by the people who danced around him. Osiris was worshiped throughout Egypt as a human body with bull's head or in the form of a bull. Isis, wife of Osiris, was worshiped under the form of a cow. She is often seen represented with a cow's head, sometimes causing her to be identified with Athor, a second-class divinity, the daughter of Ra, the sun. The Greeks believed Athor to be one with Aphrodite. The cow was her symbol, and she generally appears in hieroglyphics with a cow's head, with a sun's disk between her horns. She is represented as a cow and also as a bird with a human face, horns and a sun's disk. The third month of the Egyptian year was named for her.

The sacred bull of India is dedicated to Siva. Many figures of him, carved from rock, are found near Mysore. Of these the famous "Nandi," of Hindoo worship, is the largest. Devotees kneel on the flight of 660 stone steps which lead up to it. As the River Nile was to the Egyptians a very god, the crocodile, its creature, was a sacred thing which they feared, but never injured. Until a very recent date its worship in Egypt continued vigorously.

Serpent worship was most developed in Egypt, where a serpent represented both the evil and the good principles. The evil, red serpent, Typhon, caused the death of the good Osiris, who was sometimes represented as a falcon-headed serpent. The asp symbolized the goddess who protected houses, gardens and the infancy of a royal child. Bel was worshiped by the Chaldeans in the form of a serpent. As a dragon it abounds in Chinese mythology.

A worshiped serpent was believed to have delivered Rome from an epidemic. In our southern states and in Hayti are still to be found remnants of snake-worship. The Mohicans call a rattlesnake their grandfather. The Moquis hold snake-dances. Unless we may except the cow no creature has been more widely venerated than the serpent from the earliest times. The Phoenicians adored it as a good genius and made offerings of milk and fruit to it. Zoroaster, founder of the Magian religion of the Persians, taught that the serpent was Ahriman, Lord of Evil, who made men to sin. The Greeks worshiped a serpent as representative of Aesculapius, the famous healing god. He learned so much from watching them that they were pictured with him, placed in his temples and worshiped in his honor. Of all the serpents of his worship the Hindoo venerates the cobra most. When he finds a snake's hole he places a daily offering of food near it that the evil spirit may be propitiated. The Hindoos rested the world upon a serpent. The Orphites were a sect in the second century who venerated the serpent that tempted Eve and worshiped a real serpent, which they allowed to curl around loaves of bread which were afterward broken and distributed around as the Eucharist.

Almost god-like honors were paid to the eagle as the symbol of Jove by the Romans. Misroch was the eagle-headed deity of Assyria. Chickens and doves were used in divination. The lamb often figures in different forms of worship. The great Egyptian god, Ammon, is represented as having a ram's head. The goat also received honor. The Siamese venerate a white elephant. The greater part of the zodiacal signs are represented by animals. Legends of Vishnu closely resemble the red Indian myths and totemism is in the same class. The Indian's manitou is generally an animal chosen by himself when he reaches maturity and later adopted as the totem of his tribe. A picture of his manitou is often painted on his skin. Tattooing and heraldry are remnants of idolatry.

EDWARD JULIAN.

PINE NEEDLE TRUST.

A New Oregon Industry Which Promises to Pay Well.

Originated by a German from the Forests of Thuringia—Leaves Furnish Medicinal Oil and Fiber for Pillows.

The utilization of the pine needles of the yellow Oregon pine, botanically Pinus Ponderosa, is becoming an industry of considerable importance on the Pacific coast. Fifty years ago it was discovered that the extracts and products of the long, slender leaves of the pine possessed real efficacy in complaints of a pulmonary character. It is claimed that insomnia yields to the influence of the pungent odor, and asthmatics have found a real relief in partaking of the oil and in sleeping upon pillows stuffed with the elastic and fragrant fiber manufactured from the interior substance of the pine leaves. The illimitable forests of yellow pine abounding in the state of Oregon, with their accessibility to through lines of transportation, suggested to a German from the forests of Thuringia the transfer of a lucrative business to the Pacific coast. In Germany the leaves never exceed two inches in length, while in Oregon they often exceed 30 inches, and average 20. In the former country the forest laws are extremely strict and often prohibitive, obliging the maker of the product to use the dried leaves that have fallen to the ground and thus insuring an inferior and less effective quality of goods. In the western state denuding the yellow pine of its leaves has been encouraged, the expert of the forestry commission having pronounced the process as beneficial. A tally kept of the weight gathered from a certain number of trees indicated, according to the Scientific American, that the crop taken in April weighed 650 pounds, while that of the same trees in October yielded 775 pounds. Two crops are gathered yearly, the later one being always the largest. The leaves of the young trees are preferred, yielding a better quality of oil, it is said, though this fact is doubted. The leaves are stripped from the trees by women and men who are hired for the purpose, and who are paid 25 cents a hundred pounds for the needles. Five hundred pounds is regarded as an average day's work. The leaves are picked into sacks and hurriedly sent to the factory. Exposure to the sun causes the leaves to wilt and impairs the quality of the product. In picking, the thickest bunches of leaves are selected, and the scanty ones neglected. The vast quantity available, so far beyond any present demand, permits the picker to thus discriminate. The factory at which the essences and extracts of the needles are manufactured has a capacity for handling 2,000 pounds of leaves per day; but it is soon to be enlarged to about four times its present size.

IN A PINE NEEDLE REFINERY.
(Two Thousand Pounds of Leaves Produce Ten Pounds of Oil.)

In the extraction of pine oil 2,000 pounds of green leaves are required to produce ten pounds of oil. The process is the ordinary one of distillation. In the manufacture of fiber the leaves pass through a process of steaming, washing, drying, etc., 12 in all, occupying four days. Two qualities are produced, first and second. The first, from which no oil has been distilled, is worth upon the market about ten cents per pound. The fiber is elastic and the staple only little shorter than the green leaf from which it was made, and with strength sufficient to enable it to be spun and woven into fabrics. Mixed with hair, the fiber makes an excellent material for mattresses or pillows, and repose comes quickly when resting upon them. It is also used as a partial filling for cigars, imparting a flavor not the least disagreeable, and calming to the nerves. The oil extracted gives an agreeable flavor to candies. Toilet soaps are made, strongly impregnated with essential oil of pine needles.

The fiber itself, after curing, looks like a slender shaving of some dark wood, retaining its odor indefinitely. Insects abhor it on that account. It is said that the Oregon factory is the only one in the world outside of Germany.

Something Just as Good.

An inexperienced young man was given a position in an Albany drug store and was instructed how to effect sales. For instance, he was told that if a patron asked for something not in stock, he was to say: "We are just out, but have something quite as good." A few days later a customer asked for a postage stamp. "Oh," said the clerk, "we are just out of them, but have something fully as good."

AN INDIAN REPUBLIC.

Country of the Cherokees in the Mountains of Western North Carolina.

In Woman's Home Companion Mr. Landon Knight gives the following interesting account of a unique republic in North Carolina:

Every one, of course, knows of the little republics of Europe, but very few realize that in the United States there is a country that is larger, wealthier and more populous than San Marino, Gaust and Monico combined. Those dominions are not, nor indeed is the United States, more thoroughly rebublican than this little country nestling among the mountains of western North Carolina.

There are legends and traditions which may indicate that ages beyond the ken of the historian's vision, and when the ancestors of the princes and potentates of the world of to-day were dwelling in caves like wild beasts and were subsisting on shell-fish and acorns, these people were the lords of an ancient civilization. But, however that may be, it is certain that these people—the Cherokee Indians—were, when first discovered by the white man, the most civilized of any of the aborigines on the North American continent, with the exception of the Aztecs and Toltecs of Mexico. Oglethorpe and his colonists found them inhabiting a magnificently beautiful and fertile section of the country, embracing what is now northern Georgia, southern Tennessee and western North Carolina. They received him as a brother, and bade him take as much of their lands as he and his people might need. Writing of them to Wesley, he said: "It is strange how used they are in the ways of kindness and civility; but most do I marvel at their government, which of a truth is not unlike our own in some particulars." With truth he might have gone further and said that in many things there were points of superiority in their favor over the British government of that day. For with them the idea of a kingship and a nobility with their attendant privileges had never found a lodgment, but their theory of government was democratic, differing only in form from other democracies, and in fact relying for its strength and stability upon the consent of the governed."

WHEN WASHINGTON SWORE.

Former Secretary Foster Tells of the First President's Anger at the Senate.

In discussing the language used in treaties between governments a century or more ago, former Secretary John W. Foster explained in a lecture to Yale students recently that a treaty between the United States and Great Britain in 1783 began with these words:

"In the name of the Most Holy Trinity."

"A curious thing about those that signed that treaty on behalf of the United States," Mr. Foster said, "was that only one of the three believed in the Trinity. He was John Jay. Of the other two John Quincy Adams was a Unitarian and Benjamin Franklin—well," added the speaker, "well, Franklin could hardly be called orthodox."

Mr. Foster gave out a story about George Washington that was new to nearly everyone in the audience. The speaker was dwelling upon the prerogatives of presidents of this country, in the early days of the republic, as the only treaty-making power. The senate of the United States in those days did not have so much to say about treaty provisions. Washington, who was then president, thought he would have a conference with the senate about a treaty then under consideration.

"President Washington thought he would be nice to the senate," explained Mr. Foster, "and he met the senate. For two hours th senators, much to Washington's great annoyance, plied him with questions and cross-questions until the president, very much exasperated, retired from the senate. When he was passing through the senate he turned to one of his friends and said:

" 'I'll be d— if I'll ever come here again.' ".

SAVING A DRUNKARD.

One Case in Which a Helping Hand and Encouraging Word Helped to Work a Reformation.

"That there is nearly always that in a man which will respond to kind treatment, and that, no matter how low his social condition, a helping hand will stimulate him to efforts at bettering his condition," said Dr. William B. Martin, of Cheyenne, Wyo., at the Arlington, "was clearly proven to me during the first grand rush for the Klondike gold fields three years ago. A party was organized in my city and took along as cook a man who had for years been a hard drinker and fallen so low as to be always loafing about saloons on the lookout for a drink. He was only taken along at the urgent solicitation of one of the party who had known him in his more prosperous days, and upon the promise that he would leave liquor alone. He made good his promise from the time they started. When the party had covered about three-quarters of the journey from the point where they were landed by the Seattle steamer the provisions gave out and some of the party had to go on to the nearest Indian village, something over a hundred miles distant, in order to secure food and dogs with which to continue the journey. The man who had been a hard drinker insisted upon being one of the party to go ahead. And he did, and when two days out between the camp and the Indian village the two who accompanied him became so footsore and ill that they could neither go forward nor back. This man tramped on the remaining 40 miles to the Indian village. He reached there in a terribly exhausted condition. He made the Indians understand the condition of affairs and a party of them went back with him to where he had left the two others. They carried food with them and a pack of dogs and soon reached the camp of the original party. With this aid they continued their journey into the Klondike. In addition to his pay as cook for their camp in the Klondike every man in the party shared in a small way the fruits of his labors with this man, and the man now lives in Cheyenne, a respectable, well-to-do citizen."—Washington Star.

SHOWS ALARMING INCREASE.

Drink Bill of 1900 Over $100,000,000 More Than Ever Before—The Reasons Therefor.

It is a startling fact that the spirit bill for 1900 is over $100,000,000 greater than ever before. The first explanation of this is the general prosperity of the country. There seems to be some relation between prosperity and spirit drinking. It is found that in times of great commercial depression, as from 1895 to 1897, the consumption of spirits was very much less. When the good times of 1898 began, a rapid increase followed, until this last year, ending July 1, the largest amount of spirits in value has been used since the record began in 1876. The figures seem to indicate that malt liquors have been most largely called for. The amount per capita is over eight dollars, whereas distilled liquors, both domestic and imported, range little over six dollars, and wines reach about one dollar per capita. As we have said many times before, there are great tides of spirit drinking with a regular ebb and flow which are traceable in history. There is no doubt such a tidal movement, which will rise to a certain high level and then react, as many times before in the past. In the meantime, physicians will recognize an increase in the diseases and injuries which follow from the use of spirits, and public sentiment will support scientific efforts to neutralize and prevent it. The intense activity already manifested along these lines indicates a consciousness of the coming danger.—Journal of Inebriety.

Victory for Liquor Law.

The supreme court of Vermont has decided that the liquor law passed by the state legislature in 1898 is constitutional. This law provides that the holding of a United States license for the sale of liquor is prima facie evidence that the holder is a common seller, and he may be punished for violating the prohibitory law, although no evidence exists that a sale of liquor has actually been made.

French Postmen Must Not Drink.

The postal director at Doubs, France, has issued an order forbidding all letter carriers from accepting alcoholic drinks from their customers, both while on and off duty. He declares that the exigencies of the service demand total abstinence.

SUFFERING HUSBANDS.

Hold a Meeting and Organize a Society for Protection Against Drunken Wives.

A peculiarly pathetic bond of union existed between a small company of men gathered in one of the rooms of St. George's hall, Westminster Bridge road. They were husbands with drunken wives, and they had met for the purpose of forming a society for themselves and others in like case. Ineffectual Petruchios with a difference! Ah, no; that would be a cheap gibe in face of the pitiful statements made to ears which could detect no degree of difference in their dreadful import. It was not a woman with a froward temper each had to master, but a woman with a passion for strong drink.

They were mostly superior workingmen—one might have been Stephen Blackpool, stepped straight out of the pages of "Hard Times"—but others were evidently in a better position. They all had the same tale to tell.

"It was to be May day all our lives," said the chairman, "when we took our girl wives to church, but this curse of drink has broken our hearts and ruined our homes." Although the company was small, the organizer of the meeting, a cabman with 25 years' experience of a drunken wife to look back upon, gave the assurance that he might have got many thousands to attend. But some would not come because their wives had pawned their only decent suit of clothes for drink. Others did not care to make their afflictions known in any gathering of their fellow men; a number could not afford to take a long journey to Westminster.

For grim tragedy there was nothing to choose between any of the tales unfolded. Some had left their wives in bed, recovering from the Saturday's bout; all dreaded the effect of the mother's example on the children, especially the girls. One workingman had bought back his household effects six times in 25 years, his wife having sold them article by article for drink.

"Here," exclaimed another, with dramatic effect, "is what I found before I left home this morning," and he produced a bundle of 25 pawn tickets—mute witnesses of a wrecked home.

"Floating all over the place, I suppose," said a deep voice from the back of the room, and an assenting murmur ran through the audience.

"I've got hundreds of 'em," said a weather-beaten cabman; "I sell 'em every six months."

And so the terrible indictment ran its course, but with a strong chivalrous sentiment in it, in spite of its fierceness.

"I love my wife," said one; "my wife is a perfect angel when she is sober!" exclaimed another, with the emphasis of strong conviction.

"We married these women, and we cannot utterly cast them on," said a gentlemanly young fellow, "but we must have more protection than the law at present gives us." If there was any dissent to this "casting off" sentiment it came from a man of 30 years' experience, who admitted he was weary of it. His wife was a drunkard, and he said, with something like a wail in his voice: "My daughter, a young thing of 25, only lately married, has been led away by her mother's example, and is now lost—lost."

One speaker suggested the formation of a sort of isolated community of men with drunken wives, and, in the ultimate resort, emigration with the children, leaving the women as a burden upon a country which would give no remedy to the men. It was agreed to form an association to be called "The Husbands' Protection Society Against Drunken Wives," and to agitate for an amendment to the bishop of Winchester's habitual drunkards' bill which would put the husbands on an equality with the wives with regard to facilities for procuring a separation order.—London Chronicle.

ITEMS.

About 840 congregations in Scotland now use unfermented wine at the Lord's table.

Mr. Schwab's advice to workingmen to let strong drink alone for a year cannot be questioned, says the Cleveland Plain Dealer. And the same advice holds good for idlers, too.

The Church of Scotland Temperance society in seven years has increased its membership from 82,000 to 72,000, and now supports four temperance evangelists for preventive, rescue and reform work.

The Anti-Saloon league has decided to take a new tack in fighting saloons in Ohio and purposes to make a test case on the claim that a saloon is a public nuisance, and should be abolished.—Ram's Horn.

South Dakota has passed a law that kindness to animals shall be taught to school children, and that no experiments upon live animals shall be made in the public schools. South Dakota is the fourth state to enact such legislation.—Union Signal.

The mayor of Madrid, Spain, has ordered as a punishment that all inebriates arrested for drunkenness on the second offense shall have their hair and beards cut off once every four weeks as a mark of disgrace and punishment for the offense.—Journal of Inebriety.

The New York Central railroad employs over 30,000 men. About one per cent. are dismissed yearly through spirit drinking. Twenty years ago 20 per cent. were discharged yearly for this cause. The demand for temperate men and abstainers is more imperative every year.

THURSDAY, JULY 4, 1901.

THE REPUBLICAN TICKET.

The work of the Republican nominating Convention, which was held in Oakland on Tuesday of this week will be ratified, we have no doubt, at the polls in November, when the entire ticket will be elected by a handsome majority. It is composed of the very best material obtainable. The progressive young man and the conservative class both find representation thereon.

Beginning with the Senate, Dr. Ravenscroft, nominated for the third time, has always looked after the interests of his constituents at Annapolis and his nomination is acceptable to the people of this county as a reward for hard and persistent work in their behalf. He is well known throughout the State and has been a creditable representative of the people of Garrett county.

Messrs. P. E. Finzel and Chas. A. Ashby are both young and progressive. Their Republicanism is unquestioned and the previous experience of the former in the Legislature will be of inestimable benefit to both.

Mr. W. A. Maffett, the nominee for Sheriff, is another young man of strict business principles. For a number of years he was a public school teacher within the confines of our county. Recently he has been engaged in farming, and although maimed a number of years ago in an accident by which he lost one arm and a portion of his remaining hand, he has shown by hard work that he is fully competent to attend to the duties which will devolve upon him by his election.

For County Treasurer Mr. James W. White, of Oakland, who for twelve years has been the efficient Register of Wills, received the nomination. If Mr. White exhibits the same amount of zeal in the office for which he has been nominated and will without doubt be elected, as he has shown in the office about to be vacated by him, he will be one of the best public servants the county has ever reposed a trust in. He is a thorough accountant, reliable, trustworthy, and will command the confidence of the entire people.

For the office of County Commissioner, Messrs. Taylor Friend of District No. 2, and Jacob Stump, of District No. 4 were nominated. The Board of Commissioners composed of these gentlemen, with the present member, Mr. Peter J. Stephens, who holds over, will be probably the best ever at the head of affairs in Garrett county. In saying this we do not for a moment desire to cast reflections upon any other boards. Both gentlemen are sterling citizens and good business men. Their selection to manage the financial affairs of the county could not well be improved upon, and the confidence reposed in them by the Republicans in convention assembled will not be betrayed.

Edwin E. Friend, Esq., of District No. 7, received the nomination for Register of Wills. He has for some years been engaged at various pursuits at Mountain Lake Park, at present being assistant postmaster. He will make a splendid officer, and the training received by him while in the employ of the Government will stand him well in hand in conducting his office.

Franklin P. Green Esq., of District No. 11, who for several years past has been the efficient surveyor of the county, was again nominated. His record as a public servant cannot be excelled. He has been efficient and painstaking, and will continue to be so.

The ticket is a strong one and deserves the support of every good citizen of the county, irrespective of party affiliations.

The State Census.

The assistant superintendent of the State census, Mr. Ogden, is out in a statement of some of the results of that work. He believes that this census will show an increase in Baltimore city's population of about 5,000 souls over the Federal census and an increase in the counties of about 10,000. And this increase is the sum total of the results of the State census! When the extra session of the Legislature, in defiance of public sentiment, ordered this State enumeration it was justified on divers grounds. The Legislators claimed that frauds in the Federal census made a State enumeration imperative; that the Governor could not properly apportion legislative representation without it; that the population was not accurately taken, and many other similiar assertions were offered to appease the public.

By Mr. Ogden's own admission all of these claims have been disproved. The increase shown over the Federal census is no more than the natural increase in eleven months and a half among more than a million people. This destroys the claim of inaccuracy made against the Federal census, so that the State enumeration was wholly superfluous. The State census makes no change in the Federal corrected count—for purposes of legislative apportionment—except in the case of Dorchester county, where the gain of one delegate is attributable to a natural increase in the population. This one additional delegate does not justify the expense of the State census. Without hurt to anybody the Governor might—as he was urged to do at the time—have used the corrected Federal census as a basis for his proclamation.

But that plan did not suit. The politicians saw in this scheme a golden opportunity to fill the "pay" trough; to mulct the public treasury for the benefit of "the boys" and the Democratic machine. The milking hour is about over. The cost has been $40,000 and a deficit of unknown size. The benefits obtained by the public are absolutely nil. Will the people of Maryland never learn that Democratic machine government is one of the luxuries the State cannot afford?

THE Republican party doesn't need to reply to attacks upon the policy of the McKinley administration; they are fully answered by the condition of every branch industry and commerce in the country. Our prosperity isn't in the next State; it is everywhere, and everybody knows it is due to the carrying out of Republican ideas.

A Fine Trio.

The Democratic programme in this State, according to good authority, is Gorman to succeed Senator Wellington, Governor Smith to succeed Senator McComas, and General Louis Victor Baughman to succeed Governor Smith; and the squandering of $200,000 or more of the people's money was for the purpose of carrying out the ambitions of these gentlemen.

This is the Democratic trio that control the machine; the nominations are in their hands; in fact, they are the Democratic party. Ex-Governor Brown has published his opinion of the situation, in which he declares the party is "boss-ridden," and the ex-Governor is surely in a position to know.

The Fourth of July.

A fact which cannot fail to impress observant persons is the decadence of the Fourth of July celebration. Not so many years ago that persons on the sunny side of middle life cannot remember the time, every city, town, and hamlet made the Nation's natal day the occasion for a demonstration, and all classes of citizens joined with zest in the festivities. The Fourth was the one great day of the year for young and old, and every one seemed inspired by the spirit of '76. Patriotism was exalted, all business cares and conventional duties were laid aside, and the members of the community with one accord entered into the spirit of the occasion with hearty enthusiasm.

Now, the formal observance of July 4th is the exception rather than the rule, and the exception does not redound to the credit of the community. The eagle which was wont to flap its wings is represented by a stuffed effigy bearing a price mark. Most persons regard celebrations as a nuisance. When undertaken at all, celebrations are held with a view to pecuniary profit. The argument is: "It will bring money to town." Instead of employing the day to instill sentiments of patriotism and inculcate high conception of the duties of citizenship, we to-day utilize the Fourth as a pander to our greed for gain. We have commercialized the day. We have reduced celebrations to the level of the circus, we conduct them primarily for the same purpose, and advertise them by the same methods. Towns in which the custom of observing the Fourth survives after a fashion compete for money-paying crowds.

The old-fashioned Fourth of July has gone out. In its place we have something sordid and mean, the offspring of humbug and cupidity. The cause and the significance of the change are left to the consideration of persons who have time and inclination for the study of national character and tendencies.

Good Times On the Farm.

The beginning of the wheat harvest in the West and South, and the general prospect of a good yield have called renewed attention to the prosperity of the great agricultural classes. Marvelous stories are told of the rapid accumulation of wealth in the West and South, as shown in the bank deposits, the payment of mortgages and the large purchases of agricultural implements, vehicles and fertilizers. When one reads news of this kind it is difficult to recall that as short a time ago as 1896 the country was convulsed with complaints from the same class that is now so favored. The change has been brought about by fine crops and the higher prices of agricultural products, and also, we may be sure, by improved methods of farming. The extraordinary sales of implements and fertilizers is proof of this.

It is within the power of every tiller of the soil to apply to his business the same methods which have brought railroads and factories out of bankruptcy into prosperity. A little more skill and a little less waste will accomplish wonders.

Farming calls for hard work and plain living, but its returns are the surest of any occupation, and in such times the profits can be made large. It can be safely said that in no other vocation has there been such a percentage of men who have achieved a competence and brought up their families in decency and respect. The skilled mechanic in cities may live better and have more money to spend, but at the end of his life he rarely leaves even a home, and he has never had that feeling of independence that comes to every man who is lord of the soil. Under the circumstances it is not to be wondered at that with all the rush to the cities there is still an excellent demand for farming land, and every new strip of territory opened to settlement by the government is at once taken up.

Business and the Democratic Party.

Under the above heading the New York Sun some days ago contained the following interesting editorial:

Senator Clay of Georgia has been giving some advice to the Democratic party. He wants it to reform, to move out of Bedlam, to wave away the wild Populists, to make itself friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness. "Instead of going in the direction of Populism," he says, "we must shape our policy so as to meet the interests and the demands of the business interests of the whole country." He declares that the Democratic party "has no fight to make on capital," and that it "does not antagonize any business interests."

We don't know where Mr. Clay's Democratic party is to be found. It is not the Democratic party of 1896 and 1900. For five years that Democratic party has been fighting the business interests of the whole country. It has sought to force a debased currency upon the nation. It has cried for an income tax, a sort of fine upon capital. It has howled like a demoniac against Capital, the Money Power, Wall Street, the Corporations, the Trusts. It has tried to get into power by setting "the producing classes" against the "plutocrats." It has roared against "base commercialism." Its chief occupation has been to make itself offensive to business, and it has seemed to regard wealth as a sort of crime.

The anti-wealth crusade hasn't paid. A great many Democrats have been alienated by it. New York, New Jersey and Connecticut have been lost on account of it. In the East and in the West it has been a failure, and even the South, resignedly tolerant of Democratic eccentricities, is weary of it. It is pleasant to be prosperous, and Democrats have no objection to taking their share of prosperity. It is no wonder that many of them are restless at the abnormal position of their party, sick of radical rant, eager for more business and less buncombe. But how can a party turn a complete somersault and escape ridicule? How can the Democratic party purge itself of Populism? Not by the mere rejection of actual fusion with the Populist party. The Democracy is itself thoroughly tainted with Populist notions. The infection is less in the East, strong in the West and South. Suspicion or hatred of capital may still be seen in the legislatures of Southern States, such as Arkansas and Texas. In some Western States like Nebraska and Arkansas the Democrats amount to nothing without Populist aid. Admitting that the Democratic party can go alone, how is it to expel the Populism that has grown into it and become its master? Bryan is nothing more nor less than a Populist; and Bryan is still the Democratic leader with the greatest following. Behind him is Bryanism, a fierce, insistent, radical force, intolerant of wealth, anxious to meddle with business. Are Bryan and the Bryanites to become sane all of a sudden, give up their epileptic fits of speech, and agree all at once to "put the dollar above the man?"

And all the Democratic leaders who have been gabbling Bryanism? Even if they are willing to eat their words, can those words be forgotten? Even if the Democratic party had the wish and the power to change its principles and to appear as the friend and not the enemy of business, would business be much impressed thereby? The conversion would be too instantaneous to be accepted as genuine. A party which has been doing its worst for five years to alarm and repel conservative interests will not win the confidence of those interests until after a long probation.

Mr. Clay has laid out a big job for his party. Probably the only thanks he will get for his pains will be to be told that he is truckling to the Money Power.

REDEMPTION OF REVENUE STAMPS.

Methods of Procedure to Get Your Money Back—Why Many Will Make No Effort.

Monday last the use of internal revenue stamps in checks, drafts telegraph messages and warehouse receipts will be unnecessary. Although the treasury department has made arrangements for the redemption of unused stamps, it is not thought that Uncle Sam will be called upon to return much of the money he has collected to defray the expenses of the Spanish war. The whole procedure for obtaining what has been expended for stamps that will not be used has been so extravagantly wound in red tape that most business men will be discouraged from making an attempt to get any return at all.

First, you must have two dollars' worth of stamps or you will not be able to get any rebate. In addition to this there must be an affidavit, made not only by the owner of the stamps, stating from whom they were bought, but also by the agent, and a certificate from the collector, so that the authorities may be assured that the stamps were bought from Uncle Sam and are not counterfeits. If, however, the stamps were bought two years ago, you cannot get the rebate. This is the time limit fixed by the department. In transmitting the stamps or stamped matter to Washington for redemption by express or registered mail the expense is to be borne by the sender, and thus delivered to the department, whether the rebate is paid or not, they cannot be returned. Affidavits are to be made on forms furnished by the treasury department.

In many cases where stamps have been imprinted on checks, no effort will be made at redemption, as the expense of engraving has exceeded the price of the stamp. Many checks are very finely engraved and it would cost a great deal more to have new checks made than would be obtained in rebate. In addition to this, the rule preventing the return of stamped matter after it has been sent to the department will cause many to refrain from sending their checks; because, being numbered serially, they will not care to give them up entirely. This will result in checks with the stamps printed thereon remaining in circulation long after the first of July. All such checks will have to be returned to Washington for redemption and a claim filed with the Collector of Internal Revenue in the department in which they were printed. This must be done because of the fact that a record of all stamps printed is kept in the office of the collector. On receipt of the claim the collector will proceed to investigate its record, and will then forward the claim, properly certified if he finds it to be correct, to the treasury department in Washington.

When claims are presented by any person or firm other than the one for whom the order for imprinting was issued and whose name does not appear on the papers on which the stamps are imprinted, the claimant, in addition to the certificate of the collector or deputy collector, must satisfactorily establish ownership of the stamps and furnish a certificate of sale by each owner of them from the time of their purchase from the person or firm for whom the order for imprinting was issued.

The Best Remedy For Stomach and Bowel Troubles.

"I have been in the drug business for twenty years and have sold most all of the proprietary medicines of any note. Among the entire list I have never found anything to equal Chamberlain's Cholic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy for all stomach and bowel troubles," says O. W. Wakefield, of Columbus, Ga. This remedy cured two severe cases of cholera morbus in my family and I have recommended and sold hundreds of bottles of it to my customers to their entire satisfaction. It affords a quick and sure cure in a pleasant farm. No family should be without it. I keep it in my house at all times." For sale by all dealers.

Communicated.

To the Editor of the Republican.

The excellent article in the Oakland REPUBLICAN this week on road-making induces me again to call the attention of the Road Commissioners to my offer last autumn to drive them over a piece of road in this vicinity which is principally through the woods, up and down hill, in places very steep, in others through real bottom land and which is kept in order with the greatest ease owing to the way it is drained and crested.

The commissioners were most courteous in complying with my request but I was obliged to leave the mountains before they had an afternoon they could give me but I have just returned and will arrange to take them any afternoon they can come between now and July 10th.

Everyone feels the importance of good roads—the faamer even more than the summer visitor—but farmers are sometimes easygoing and put up with bad roads (though good roads would save their time and their horses and mean money in their pockets) while summer visitors will simply go to some other place where the roads are better than hereabouts.

This mountain district is as accessable to Washington, Baltimore, Pittsburg and Philadelphia as such places as Lenox and has great climatic advantages over them—why should it not become as successful a summer resort spreading prosperity through the district by means of summer residents? And what is there that attracts them more than really fine roads through a beautiful country?

Thanking the Commissioners for their past interest and THE REPUBLICAN for its voice I am,

Very truly yours,
A SUMMER RESIDENT.

A conflagration was narrowly averted on Friday evening last at George O. Miller's store, on Oak street. A large lamp, used to illuminate the building, exploded and set fire to some goods. The flames were extinguished without doing much damage, but had they gathered headway the result might have been very serious.

Messrs. Chas. D. Smith and Totten Matthews, of Oakland, were in town Tuesday on business. Mr. Smith is preparing to open a law office at this place and will occupy the second floor of the Glover building. Terra Alta will heartily welcome the advent of a real resident lawyer and your correspondent prophecies a successful career for Mr. S. in his chosen profession.—Terra Alta Republican.

The greater number of people who know that a man is in business and what he sells, the better his business will be. Advertising is the quickest and best way to impart this information: newspaper advertising is the best kind of advertising, because it will carry the information to more people for less cost than any other kind. This is a fact which a lead pencil and a little figuring will demonstrate beyond argument.

Many thousands have been restored to health and happiness by the use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. If afflicted with any throat or lung trouble, give it a trial for it is certain to prove beneficial. Coughs that have resisted all other treatment for years, have yielded to this remedy, and perfect health been restored. Cases that seemed hopeless, that the climate of famous health resorts failed to benefit, have been permanently cured by its use. Bear in mind that every bottle is warranted and if it does not prove beneficial the money will be refunded to you. For sale by all dealers.

Teachers' Convention Adjourned.

The convention of public school teachers of the State of West Virginia which was in session at Mountain Lake Park three days this week adjourned this afternoon. Prior to adjourning a vote was taken as to the place of next the meeting. Three points for the next meeting were recommended by the committee—Huntington, White Sulphur Springs and Mountain Lake Park. A vote was taken by the convention as a body, which resulted in the selection of the Park as the place for the meeting next year.

July Court.

The non-jury term of court convened here on Monday with Judge Edward Stake on the bench. Very little business was transacted and the term closed last night at 11.20 o'clock.

The only case tried was that of Merriam vs. the Cumberland Paper Company, which had been continued from the June term. The case involves the title to a valuable tract of timber land near Sang Run. The verdict has not yet been rendered.

Judge Stake returned to Hagerstown this moraing.

A Sudden Death.

Jonah Kennedy, colored, who has for a number of years been a respected resident of Loch Lynn Heights, where he was employed as a porter and watchman at the Loch Lynn Hotel, died on Monday morning of a malignant affection of the lymphatic tissues. His illness dated from Wednesday of last week and the disease was of such a serious nature as to cause his neck to swell until it measured 28 inches in circumference. His funeral took place Monday afternoon, the interment being made in the Oakland cemetery, from which place, we understand, the body will be exhumed and removed to the Luke Male farm, west of town, at which point other members of his family are buried. The deceased was about twenty-five years of age.

Stunned by Lightning.

Two young sons of Jacob S. Miller, Esq., of near Grantiville, were engaged on Thursday of last week working in a field, when a bolt of lightning descended so near to them as to instantly kill their horse and render the boys unconscious, in which condition they were later found and conveyed to their home. One of the boys was very seriously affected by the ligntning and it was only by the hardest work that he was restored to consciousness.

CORNERSTONE LAID.

New St. Peter's Catholic Church in Oakland.

Sunday afternoon at four o'clock in the presence of a vast crowd of people representing every denomination of this and adjacent communities, the cornerstone of the new St. Peter's Catholic church was laid by Bishop Curtis with impressive ceremonies.

The cornerstone is a massive piece of white marble with the name of the church cut in bas relief thereon. The workmanship on the stone was beautifully executed and in the receptacle for the purpose was placed a copy of THE REPUBLICAN, Mountain Democrat, Garrett Journal and the Baltimore Sun, a compendium of the principal events of the parish, names of the leading men of the day, coins of different countries and a medal commemorative of the Holy Year, ordered by Pope Leo.

Excursion trains from Cumberland, Lonaconing and other points in the George's Creek region were run to Oakland on that day which brought several hundred strangers and the Lonaconing band to town. The latter organization, in conjunction with the Oakland band, furnished music for the occasion.

During the day meals were served by the ladies of the church to the multitude gathered.

The people here from a distance enjoyed the day, although it was excessively warm, and at three o'clock the church societies headed by the Lonaconing band marched from Offutt's Hall to the site of the new church where exercises prior to the laying of the cornerstone were gone through with.

Revs. T. E. Gallagher, of Cumberland, and James E. Connell, the church pastor, acted as assistants to the Bishop; Messrs. Thos. McGuigan, Joseph Noland, Kenald Keegan and John Smith, of St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, also assisted.

Rev. Thos. J. Stanton, of Lonaconing, preached the sermon. He said in part:

In the fourth chapter of the book of Joshua we read that when the Israelites had crossed the River Jordan Almighty God commanded them to take twelve hard stones and set them up as a monument where they had pitched their tents for the night. "And when your children shall ask you, 'What mean these stones?' you shall relate to them the wonders that God hath wrought; that all the people of the earth may learn the mighty hand of the Lord, and that you yourselves may fear the Lord your God forever."

Nearly thirty-five centuries have piled their dust on the desolate shore where Joshua erected his monument, and the children who asked of their parents, "What mean these stones?" have for long, long ages slept in their native dust; and we to-day, the children of a new dispensation in a new country, stand in the presence of a new monument, raised to Almighty God, and like the children of Israel we naturally ask, "What mean these stones?" And the time and the circumstances require that we make answer.

"What mean these stones" blessed solemnly this afternoon? What means this vast assembly? It means an epoch in the history of your parish; an era in Catholic progress; an advance in humanity; a move of earth towards heaven! A new church for Oakland! a new altar of sacrifice! a new temple dedicated to God! The words speak so eloquently to my soul that I must give expression to some of the thoughts which they inspire and some of the feelings which they awaken. This ceremony speaks eloquently of the vigorous life of your congregation to-day and the magnificent promise of its future. Some among you have vivid recollections of the past, when priests and churches in this portion of the Archdiocese were few. You can recall the time when the angel of death was knocking at the door and no priest near to prepare the departing soul for the dark voyage of eternity. Some among you can recall to-day the time when the zealous Father Slattery traversed this territory, administering to the few scattered Catholics from Cumberland on the east to the Virginia line on the west, within the limits of whose parish to-day worship, at the lowest estimate, 15,000 Catholic souls, and a score of priests offer up the "clean oblation," foretold by Malachy, at more than twenty Catholic altars. The laying of the corner-stone of the new St. Peter's church speaks, therefore, of a healthy and vigorous growth of your parish, a move of earth towards heaven, an approach of the people towards God.

Here the speaker broadened out his subject, and described the triumphal march of Christ through the centuries. He sketched, in particular, the historical relations of the Church with the new world. He, in conclusion, expressed sincere and heartfelt congratulations to the young, active and succersful pastor, and exhorted the people to co-operate with him by substantial aid—and thus the old Church in this prince of lands will secure another grand victory in the grandest of history's ages.

SUPERB SINGING.

At High Mass in the present church edifice at 10:30 o'clock in the morning Millard's Mass in G was rendered by the choir, with Mrs. Mary Donohue Moran, of Grafton, W. Va., as soprano soloist and leader of the choruses and Miss Estelle Rasche, of this place, the clever and proficient young church organist, as accompanist. Mrs. Moran, the soprano of the occasion, is a graduate of the famous Mt. DeChantel School, near Wheeling, W. Va., the standard of whose vocal excellence is nowhere surpassed, and whose methods are the result of the life study of one of the most peerless vocalists that ever lived, the divine-voiced Sister Mary Agnes, and which were left as a priceless legacy to that institution by this marvelous Queen of Song. A pupil and graduate of such a method could, therefore, hardly fail to win commendation from the most critical and exacting of audiences, and it goes without saying that all who heard her on this occasion were highly delighted with her performances, and not a few of those whose capacity to judge is unquestioned pronounced the vocalist's work as being, in many respects, of the most magnificent and phenomenal order. Her finished solo work and great facility of execution in the choruses acted as a sort of inspiration to the other singers and incited them to greater and more effective work in their several roles, with the result that a highly creditable musical program was rendered. Should Mrs. Moran again elect to sing here, she may be assured of a cordial welcome and a most appreciative reception from all who are fortunate enough to hear her.

His Leg Cut Off.

Benjamin, aged 12 years, son of Mr. and Mrs. Adam Long, of Deer Park, had the misfortune on Tuesday afternoon to fall under the wheels of a freight train which he attempted to board at Deer Park, and as a result one of his legs was so crushed as to necessitate amputation, the operation being performed at the McComas sanitarium here the same evening.

Lightning's Pranks.

During the heavy electrical storm which passed over this section Wednesday afternoon a bolt of lightning struck a large oak tree near the new home of Mr. Henry Weber, east of town. On the tree was a telephone wire leading to his house from the green houses and connecting with the station here and at Deer Park. The lightning followed this wire and set fire to the green house but luckily doing little damage except to the telephone. At the time of the shock a number of ladies were present at Mr. Weber's gardens, one of whom it is thought was overcome by the lightning but soon rallied.

Heartburn.

When the quantity of food taken is too large or the quality too rich, heartburn is likely to follow, and especially so if the digestion has been weakened by constipation. Eat slowly and not to freely of easily digested food. Masticate the food thoroughly. Let six hours elapse between meals and when you feel a fullness and weight in the region of the stomach after eating, indicating that you have eaten too much, take one of Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets and the heartburn may be avoided. PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, at the January Session in the year nineteen hundred of the General Asembly of Maryland, bills were passed proposing amendments to the Constitution of the State:

First.—By amending section 9 of Article 5, of the Constitution of the State.

Second.—By amending section 4 of Article 3, of the Constitution of the State.

Third.—By amending section 2 of Article 3, of the Constitution of the State, which said bills and amendments are in words following, to wit:

CHAPTER 185.

AN ACT to amend section nine, of Article 5, of the Constitution of this State, and to provide for the submission of said amendment to the qualified voters of this State for adoption or rejection.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, (three-fifths of all the members elected to each of the two Houses concurring,) That the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to Article 5, of the Constitution of this State, and if adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof, herein and as by law provided, it shall supersede and stand in the place and stead of section nine of said Article.

SECTION 9. The State's Attorney shall perform such duties and receive such fees and commissions or salary not exceeding three thousand dollars, as are now or may hereafter be prescribed by law; and if any State's Attorney shall receive any other fee or reward than such as is or may be allowed by law, he shall, on conviction thereof, be removed from office; provided that the State's Attorney for Baltimore city shall receive an annual salary of forty-five hundred dollars, and shall have power to appoint one deputy, at an annual salary not exceeding three thousand dollars, and such other assistants at such annual salaries not exceeding fifteen hundred dollars each, as the Supreme Bench of Baltimore City may authorize and approve; all of said salaries to be paid out of the fees of the said State's Attorney's office, as has heretofore been practiced.

SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That the foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of this State, shall be, at the next general election for members of the General Assembly, to be held in this State, submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof for their adoption or rejection, in pursuance of the direction contained in Article 14, of the Constitution; and at said election the vote on said proposed amendment shall be by ballot, and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words "For the Constitutional Amendment" or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voter shall elect, and immediately after said election one return shall be made to the Governor of the vote on said proposed amendment, as directed by the said Fourteenth Article of the Constitution.

Approved April 5, 1900.

CHAPTER 432.

AN ACT to amend section four, of Article 3, of the Constitution of this State.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, (three-fifths of all the members of the two Houses concurring,) That the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of this State, and if adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof as herein provided, said section shall supersede and stand in the place and instead of section four of Article 3, of said Constitution.

SECTION 4. As soon as may be after the taking and publishing of the National Census of 1900, or after the enumeration of the population of this State, under the authority thereof, there shall be an apportionment of representation in the House of Delegates, to be made on the following basis, to wit: Each of the several counties of the State, having a population of eighteen thousand souls or less, shall be entitled to two delegates; and every county having a population of over eighteen thousand and less than twenty-eight thousand souls, shall be entitled to three delegates; and every county having a population of twenty-eight thousand and less than forty thousand souls, shall be entitled to four delegates; and every county having a population of forty thousand and less than fifty-five thousand souls, shall be entitled to five delegates; and every county having a population of fifty-five thousand souls and upwards, shall be entitled to six delegates and no more; and each of the four legislative districts of the City of Baltimore shall be entitled to the number of delegates to which the largest county shall or may be entitled under the aforegoing apportionment, and the General Assembly shall have the power to provide by law, from time to time, for altering and changing the boundaries of the existing legislative districts of the City of Baltimore, so as to make them as near as may be of equal population; but said district shall always consist of contiguous territory.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, shall, at the next election for members of the General Assembly of this State, to be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, nineteen hundred and one, be submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof, for their adoption or rejection, in pursuance of the directions contained in Article 14, of the Constitution of this State; and at the said election the vote on said proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be by ballot, and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words, "For the Constitutional Amendment," or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voter shall elect, and immediately after the said election due returns shall be made to the Governor of the vote for and against said proposed amendment, as directed by the said Article 14 of the Constitution.

Approved April 7, 1900.

CHAPTER 469.

AN ACT to amend section two of Article 3 of the Constitution of the State.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, (three-fifths of all the members of the two Houses concurring,) That the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of this State, and if adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof, as herein provided, said section shall supersede and stand in the place and stead of section two of Article 3 of said Constitution.

2. The City of Baltimore shall be divided into four legislative districts as near as may be of equal population and of contiguous territory, and each of said legislative districts of Baltimore City, as they may from time to time be laid out, in accordance with the provisions hereof, and each county in the State, shall be entitled to one Senator, who shall be elected by the qualified voters of the said legislative districts of Baltimore City, and of the counties of the State, respectively, and shall serve for four years from the date of his election, subject to the classification of Senators hereafter provided for.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution shall at the next election for members of the General Assembly of this State, to be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, nineteen hundred and one, be submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof for their adoption or rejection, in pursuance of the directions contained in Article 14 of the Constitution of this State; and at the said election the vote on said proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be by ballot, and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words, "For the Constitutional Amendment," or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voter shall elect, and immediately after the said election due returns shall be made to the Governor of the vote for and against said proposed amendment, as directed by the said Fourteenth Article of the Constitution.

Approved April 7, 1900.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JOHN WALTER SMITH, Governor of the State of Maryland, in pursuance of the provisions of section one of Article fourteen of the Constitution of the State, do hereby order and direct that a copy of said bills proposing said Constitutional Amendments be published in at least two newspapers in each county where so many may be published, and where not more than one may be published, then in that newspaper, and in three newspapers in the City of Baltimore, one of which shall be in the German language, once a week for at least three months preceding the next ensuing general election (which said general election will be held on Tuesday, the 5th day of November, nineteen hundred and one,) at which the said proposed amendments shall be submitted to the qualified voters of the State for adoption or rejection, so that each amendment shall be voted on separately.

Given under my hand and the Great Seal of Maryland.

Done at the City of Annapolis on the 12th day of June, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and one.

[SEAL] JOHN WALTER SMITH,
Governor of Maryland.

By order of the Governor:
WILFRED BATEMAN,
Secretary of State.

ODE FOR INDEPENDENCE DAY.

HE rattle of crackers, the roar of the guns—
What do they tell you, O, wondering ones?
The rockets that spread
Streams of stars overhead;
The banners that float
And the bugle's brave note—
All tell the story our grandsire's sons
Heard from their fathers of Tyranny's fall;
Tell the great story of gallantry bred
Out of men's hate for the bonds that enthrall—
Tell the high story
Of God-given glory—
Of strength for the just and the Lord o'er us all!

Deathless the love they won
While love shall last,
While still from sire to son
Precepts are passed—
While the stars shine
O'er your country and mine!
Shame on the man who is racked by the sounds—
Narrow the zone that his little soul bounds!
Let the guns roar,
Let the red rockets soar,
And bring from the smithies the anvils once more!
With the fife and the drum
And the bugle and bomb
Let the universe know that the great day is come!
For their glory who turned from the plow to the sword
Make a sound—make a sound of great joy to the Lord!

By the deeds they wrought,
By the fights they fought,
By the freedom that with their rich blood they bought,
Let us pledge ourselves anew
To be worthy of and true
To the trust they handed down,
Each a monarch in his right,
Worthy of a monarch's crown!
Let us keep the banner bright—
Keep its starry field of blue,
And its stripes of red and white
Free from stain,
So that where it floats at sea,
Or upon the starry plain
It may be
Still the emblem they designed
And, in dying, consecrated—
Still the flag they dedicated
To the glory of mankind!

What is the story the skyrockets tell,
Soaring up over the walls of the night?
'Tis the story of pride that was lofty and fell
When the stars of our freedom burst grandly in sight,
Flooding the world with their glorious light!
As the years go by
And traditions die,
And men aspire,
Let the beacons flash on crag and shore,
Let the signal lights rise higher, higher,
Ever more brilliant than before;
Ever till earth from her orbit shall fall
Let the scepters they won
Pass from sire to son—
Each a king in his right and the Lord o'er us all!

OUR CELEBRATION AT TWO-OWE-TEE.

BY F. W. CRISSMAN.

LAST Fourth of July the weather came on cool and beautiful in our mountains. But there were three people at Black Rock Horse ranch who were anything but cool. In fact, Ferd, Florence and I were as "hot" as we could well become—hot with impatience and disgust.

For more than four weeks we had been preparing for a celebration, a picnic at our cottonwood grove, with all the family and all our neighbors along Black Rock creek to join in making a great day. Ferd, who had borrowed some volumes of the Congressional Record from some local politician, had written a short address, and Florence had practiced diligently some patriotic songs. Moreover, we had expended $8 for fireworks, of a magnitude worthy of the largest attainable crowd.

Our discomfiture may be imagined when I say that father, mother and the younger children had failed in a promised return from their visit at Green River, and that, just two days before the Fourth, report had reached Black Rock Valley of a "monster celebration" which was to be held at Lander, and to which every mother's son and daughter in our neighborhood had stampeded.

We were left alone, we three; so far as we knew, there was not a soul left within 25 miles of us.

We were, of course, still looking for the return of our family from Green River, but as the morning slipped away and 11 o'clock came, with no sign of them, Ferd and I gave ourselves up to sulking. We were lying upon our backs in the shade of some cottonwoods near a horse corral, when Florence, who was still on the lookout, shouted to us.

"They're coming!" she cried, running toward us and clapping her hands joyfully. "I can see the dust of their wagon down the valley. Splendid! splendid! We'll have a celebration all to ourselves!" As there are eight of us altogether, the prospect was not quite so disheartening.

Ferd and I sprang to our feet and climbed the corral fence to look. What we saw was a flying trail of dust rising above a point about a mile distant. A glance, however, showed our more practiced eyes that the dust cloud was altogether too great to be kicked up by a span of mules and a spring wagon.

"That's not them," declared Ferd, in disgust. "It's a stampede of horses or cattle." A faint roar of trampling hoofs soon bore to our ears the proof of his assertion. The dust cloud increased in volume, and the mutter of pounding hoofs jarred like a distant rumble of thunder.

Our suspicions were quickly roused. We craned our necks and watched in silence. We had only a minute to wait before a big bunch of horses, going at a swift trot, broke cover of the point. A few seconds later, we discovered, on the outskirts of the herd, which doubtless numbered many horses of our own, two pony riders turning the leaders across the valley.

We did not have to guess that these men were "rustlers," and that there were more of them in the rear pushing the horses forward. Every movement of herd and men proclaimed the fact. A gang of our mountain freebooters had taken advantage of the stockmen's "stampede" to Lander to make another stampede, which should be vastly to their own advantage.

The men were steering their catch across Black Rock valley up to the mouth of Two-owe-tee pass. Once through that difficult gap, they would hustle the herd into the fastnesses of Owl Creek mountains, break it up into small bunches and get away with the horses at their leisure.

Ferd and I did not say this to each other—we did not need to do so. We slipped off the fence presently, and looked at each other in a grim kind of way.

"SHE STOOPED OVER—AS IF TO AT TEND TO HER FOOTING."

"Well," said Ferd, "we've got to head off that herd, stampede and scatter 'em, somehow."

"Sure thing!" I assented.

When Florence understood the case, she set up a frantic wail. "You shan't go!" she almost screamed. "Those men will shoot you dead! Anyway, if you do, I'll go along and be shot, too!"

"You will stay at home, Florry," said Ferd, kindly, but in his masterful way. "We'll take good care of ourselves, never fear."

Thereupon she ran to the house, crying. We could not stop to comfort her. While Ferd went for our guns, trappings and a snack to eat, I ran to the creek pasture, got out two of our best riding ponies and saddled them. When I had finished Ferd came out, wearing his hunting jacket and carrying my jacket and our guns.

The big side pockets of the coats were stuffed to bulging, but my jacket felt light enough, and when I thrust a hand into one of the pockets and drew out a giant "cracker" of the biggest size, I fairly whooped with delight. There were a half dozen in each pocket, and each one was a foot in length. They would make enough noise to stampede a whole tribe of Indians, let alone 400 or 500 half-wild horses.

We were off in a twinkling. We knew of an old buffalo and cattle trail a half-mile distant, leading up to the head of Black Rock, and round the slopes of several mountains into the north gap of Two-owe-tee. This trail we took.

"We'll plant ourselves in front of that herd in the gap," said Ferd, "and there we'll have our celebration. I believe we can 'counter stampede,' run 'em over that crowd and get away in the dust and racket."

The very probable event of a fight against odds, however, kept us feeling pretty sober. We clattered along the cut-off at a hard gallop, without exchanging many remarks.

We rode on for more than an hour, passing up out of Black Rock and over a mountain ridge. Then we heard a clatter of hoofs at our heels, and turned to face Florence. Her pony was sweating, her face was flushed and beseeching, as she pulled up confronting us. As the trail was a plain one, she had had no difficulty in following.

"I can't stay behind!" she announced, breathlessly. "I should die of fright. I don't believe those men will fight when they see a girl along."

So that was her reason for coming! We looked at each other in dismay and some disgust. But she was a girl of 16, a capable horsewoman and of a determined spirit. We could not compel her to stay behind.

"Well," said Ferd, "when we get to business you'll have to stay where we put you, or we'll tie you up!"

Then we "hit" the trail again, and Florence followed. I looked back to see that she was crying, although she rode bravely, and I was truly sorry for her.

In the course of three hours of hard riding we came out of a sharp cut into the canyon of Two-owe-tee. A brief examination convinced us that we should find no better point at which to make a break in the herd and turn them back upon the rustlers. The gap of Two-owe-tee was here some 200 yards in width, with inaccessible steeps on either hand.

We rather counted on a fight, and Ferd planned for it like a general. He even consented that Florence should take a part in cannonading the herd, whereat she at once became a calm and superior person. She agreed to keep close in to the mouth of the cut, after we should get the herd going, and in a certain length of time to take her flight back over the trail by which we had come.

Even when we told her we should fight, pointing out from a height the high banks of a dry run where we should make our stand when we had run the herd over the rustlers, she approved the plan.

"You can stand them off easily!" she declared. "Their bullets can't hit you in there, and if they charge you can stampede them with crackers."

We rather thought so ourselves. We then ate a bit of dinner and rested, listening meanwhile for the tramp of the herd. It was nearly four o'clock when we heard the rumble of their hoofs and sighted their trail of dust up the canyon.

We quickly took our places. Florence stood just outside the mouth of the cut, with several giant crackers and some matches in hand. She was a little pale, but cool and collected, and showed no sign of fear.

Ferd and I sat our ponies on either side the creek-bed and waited. I must admit, in a state of considerable excitement. We had no fear for our seats, however, as our ponies were gun-broken to firing from the saddle, and would not shy even at cannon-shots. They were, in fact, accustomed to the crack of dynamite and black powder, used in breaking rock and splitting logs near our house.

The foremost horses of the herd were soon close at hand. Of course the dust they raised completely hid us from view of the rustlers in their rear.

They were coming at a free trot on each side of the creek channel. We waited until the leaders had halted, snorting, in front of us. Then we lighted our crackers and flung them—eight or ten—one after the other. Florence took her part in the cannonade, throwing her crackers as far as she could toward the horses.

For half a minute the canyon roared and reverberated with an astounding racket. This thunder and smoke flung the leading horses back upon their fellows until all were bunched like a flock of scared sheep.

Then we rode at them, each of us flinging a final cracker upon their heels, and all of us yelling like crazy Bannocks at a frolic. In no time we had them going—just "hitting the wind" in the wildest kind of a "counter-stampede." We followed, aware at first of the active operations of rustlers in our front. The swerving lines of horses told us plainly enough where they were. The dust and confusion prevented our seeing anything more than half a dozen yards distant.

By great good luck, we came together in crossing a curve of the creek-bed. We rode at the tail of the herd until assured that the frightened horses would run as long as they were able—that our stampede could not be countered for an hour or more. We knew, from the time which had elapsed, that the rustlers, not fearing immediate pursuit, had saved wind and speed for a long chase.

And now we turned back, determined to take our stand in the mouth of the cut and guard the pass until the stockmen should begin to come in from Lander. It was only through the gap of Two-owe-tee that the rustlers could hope to run stock off our range.

Dust hung heavily in the gap, and in order to dodge the rustlers, if possible, we rode back down the creek channel, which held only here and there pools of water.

But luck turned against us just as we had reached a point nearly opposite the mouth of the cut. While riding across a flat where the ditch was extremely shallow, we sighted four horsemen scouting cautiously, evidently trying to discover the cause of the tremendous racket which had turned the stock. They might easily have thought that miners were at work blasting rock somewhere near—doubtless they had come to some such conclusion.

But they saw us before we could get to cover. They were between us and the mouth of the cut, and they wheeled in an ugly fashion, holding their Winchesters at a "ready." We slipped out of our saddles and got behind our ponies.

The fellows were suspicious of a larger force close at hand, or they would doubtless have charged us at once. They looked about rather anxiously, scanning the creek banks above and below.

As the dust had cleared somewhat, we could see their faces quite plainly. They were not more than 50 or 60 yards away. Three of them were dressed as cowboys and looked like ordinary line riders. The fourth, and apparently the leader, wore a blue woolen shirt and a stiff hat. He had a drooping black mustache and long hair.

Presently the four got in line and began moving slowly toward us. They evidently wanted to make sure of us at the first fire.

"Halt where you are or somebody'll get hurt!" shouted Ferd. The rustlers glanced at each other. Two of them grinned wickedly. They came on without pausing.

Scared as I was, I was far more frightened in behalf of those reckless men than on my own account. If they could have known how quick and certain Ferd is with a rifle, they certainly would have kept their distance. I knew one of them must fall at my brother's first fire, and if they charged in saddle I did not doubt he would kill them all before they could reach us—he is just as quick as that on the trigger, and he works his lever as a boy flips a marble. His rifle was already leveled, covering the leader.

"Halt, there, I tell you!" he called again, and in a tone that would have stopped any but the most desperate of men. The men fingered their Winchesters. They were about to begin the fight. Then in a breath and out of the dust that still banked along the steeps Florence came galloping at them.

The fellows turned their heads quickly at hearing the patter of her pony's hoofs, and the leader wheeled his horse sharply about. The latter lowered the rifle he had half-presented when he saw a girl confronting him. It was well enough for him that he did so.

Florence coolly pulled up in front and a little to one side of this astonished rustler.

"Those are my brothers down there," we heard her saying in a clear voice. "I am going to help them drive the horses. I guess my stirrup-strap is breaking loose." And she stooped over on the side opposite the man, as if to attend to her footing.

Then, before the leader or his men could recover from their surprise, Florence straightened up and flung a hissing cracker at his pony's head.

At 15 feet she ought not to have missed, but the pony dodged at the motion of her arm, and her big yellow cracker struck the rider somewhere about his belt and exploded. The man was knocked or thrown out of his saddle, sprawling like a stricken frog. The pony sprang away, reeling from the concussion.

One of the mounted men yelled: "Dynamite!" and all three put spurs to their dancing ponies, and were out of range and out of sight in no time.

Ferd and I now advanced, with our guns covering the fallen rustler, who had raised himself to a sitting posture and seemed to be groping for his Winchester. He was blind and dizzy as yet from the shock he had received.

Florence had dismounted and secured his gun.

"I'm dreadfully sorry I hurt you, sir," we heard her saying, ruefully. "I only meant to stampede your horses and keep you from shooting at my brothers."

She had indeed done execution. The man's shirt front was blown away, his breast and face were blackened with powder, his mustache and eyebrows were singed off, and his eyes were red and bleary, and rolled like those of a drunken man.

He was still light-headed when Ferd and I came up. We got him to his feet and walked him around a bit. Florence ran to a pool and brought water in my wool hat. He drank eagerly.

When he had fully recovered his senses, we knew that he was not seriously injured. He sat down upon the ground presently, and although the pain of his burns must have been acute, he grinned at us in a kind of grim humor.

"Well," he asked, "goin' to shoot me up?"

I had already caught his horse.

"Get into your saddle and get out of these parts," said Ferd. "Try to make an honest living in future, and no one will hurt you."

The man, with a grimace of humiliation, mounted his animal and rode away. We were glad enough to see the last of him.

We overtook the main herd of stampeded horses near the summit of the pass. That night we slept upon beds of spruce boughs. We reached home about eight o'clock in the morning, and found the rest of the family awaiting us. They thought we must have gone to Lander.

When the stockmen came back from Lander they were in a great state of indignation. There had been no celebration, and they had ridden a hundred miles and back for nothing. It soon turned out that the rustlers themselves had caused the false report to be circulated.

I must say that Florence is now a person of considerable reputation in these parts.—Youth's Companion.

HOW TO GROW RHUBARB.

Production of Large Stalks for Exhibition or Choice Trade Is a Lucrative Occupation.

Families who move on to a new farm will find that the quickest way to produce a supply of material for pies, sauces, etc., is to set out rhubarb plants. If these are obtained by dividing old hills they will begin growing at once, and can be pulled a little the first season. A dozen hills will supply an average family. It may also be grown from seed. One pound will sow about six average hotbed frames and should yield at least 1,000 plants.

A practical way to blanch stalks in spring is to throw up the soil with a plow about one foot thick over the hill. Nearly the whole stalk will then be blanched and more delicate in color and flavor. This covering of earth must be leveled down when the cutting ceases. Keeping up the leveling process will dispose of most of the weeds. The leaves after cutting, if spread on the earth about the hills, will also assist greatly in smothering the weeds, besides having considerable fertilizing value and acting as a partial mulch.

When it is desired to grow especially large stalks of rhubarb for a choice trade or for exhibition purposes, it is possible to increase the natural size by thinning out all but the vigorous center buds, simply cutting them off with a sharp spade, allowing the whole strength of the roots to go to the large, vigorous looking buds, of which not more than one or two should be allowed to develop. To stimulate the hill to its utmost, set a large flower pot into the ground between the hills, in the row, as in the accompanying illustration, and fill it often with liquid manure of which too much cannot be given. A good substitute for liquid manure is nitrate of soda dissolved in water, using about a teaspoonful of soda to two or three quarts of water. Varieties like the mammoth treated by this plan will grow stocks of enormous size and attract much attention. —Orange Judd Farmer.

QUALITY OF BUTTER.

Tests Made at the Illinois University Station Show That It Varies from Day to Day.

At the agricultural station attached to the Illinois university, a test was conducted last year for the special object of studying the variations in the yield and quality of milk obtained from a number of cows specially selected for the purpose, and the results obtained were very curious, and in many respects very conflicting. The experiment lasted for a period of close on a year. As an outcome of the results obtained during the period the officials having charge of the researches came to the following conclusions: 1. The yield of milk from different cows under the same conditions differs greatly, and that from the same cow varies greatly from day to day. 2. The composition of milk is highly variable; the ratio of the fat to other solids, and that of other solids to water are not constant as between different cows or for the same cow on successive days. 3. The percentage of fat or of other solids is not always highest in the smaller yields, but cows that give milk with a high per cent. of solids generally show a low total yield. 4. Fat is the most variable constituent of milk, and its variations are independent of those of the other solids; therefore, the yield of milk is a better intedx of the other solids than it is of the fat. 5. As regards the first and last milk drawn, the proportion of solids not fat is higher in the first, but the proportion of fat is decidedly greater in the last. 6. Neither day time nor night time is shown to be superior as a milk-producing period. 7. Different cows differ in their power to make milk from food, and the same cow varies in this respect from time to time. 8. Aside from the influence of food or environment, each animal exhibits individual variations of her own, and such variations tend to show something like periodicity in the separate functional activities of the animal body.

TIMELY DAIRY NOTES.

The importance of healthy cows and sound milk cannot be over-estimated. Too little attention has been given to the matter in the past.

Butter may look nice, have the correct grain and be salted to taste, still if it lacks flavor or has a bad flavor it sells at reduced price, ir at all. It is the fine flavor in butter that all seek after.

If you are in the dairy business to stay, there is more than one reason for raising your own calves. You can not only develop the best milking strains in this way, but you can be more sure of having quiet and gentle cows.—Nebraska Farmer.

BLACK EARTH ROADS.

When Properly Constructed and Cared For This Sort of Highway Is Not to Be Despised.

For several years I was an earnest advocate of hard roads, and believed that the best interests of the farmer demanded them, but I have to a considerable extent changed my mind. For over a year I have been watching a real up-to-date "road-keeper" care for about eight miles of common black-earth road, and to say he has done good work would be putting it mildly. I am now well satisfied that if our common earth roads are properly and thoroughly cared for—if they are well built at the right time and repairs are made promptly—there is no necessity whatever for going to the enormous expense of building hard roads except in limited districts. In due time the trolley will come into the west, as it already has into many portions of the east, and in most sections long hauls of farm produce will soon be a thing of the past. Where the materials for making hard roads are cheap and near by they can be built at reasonable cost; but when they are distant and must be freighted it is nonsense to talk about building them. It would be far better to adopt the method of the "road-keeper" mentioned above.

His district lies in a black-soil section where rain quickly converts soil into mud. He has learned that where the grade is tile-drained and rounded so that the water quickly flows off, the road is easily kept in good condition. The first thing done was to provide good drainage; after that to keep the grade well rounded and the ruts filled by the use of the road-hone. As soon after a rain as the grade is dry enough the hone is run over it and the surface made perfectly smooth. At the edges of bridges and culverts, where are often found ugly "drop-offs" and deep ruts when the roads are not properly cared for, he dug out the soil to a depth of about 18 inches and filled in with broken brick and tile, covering them with cinders, and there the road is as solid as a rock. To place one man in charge of the roads of a township or district would remove the burden and bother of road-tinkering off the farmers, and most of them could, by attending to their crops at the season when road work should be done, make many times more than they could save by tinkering on the road. The idea of working a road into fair condition one week and letting it go to ruin the rest of the year is utter foolishness, and the sooner a change is made the better. The reading, thinking farmer knows this, and he is patiently waiting for the leaven to work among his neighbors. Agitation for costly hard roads and a great burden of debt has served to intensify the opposition to reasonable schemes for road improvement. The best thing we can do till the trolley comes, and after it comes, is to adopt the "road-keeper's" system—pay steady, skilled men a salary to build our roads in the best manner with the material at hand, and then keep them up the year round. If this is done we will have, even in the black-soil districts, very good roads nine of ten months of the year, and they would be passable the other two months, while the cost of living would in the end be much less than the present overseer-poll-tax-everybody-work foolishness. — Fred Grundy, in Farm and Fireside.

RELIABLE FLOOD GAP.

When Properly Made No Stock of Any Kind, Large or Small, Will Attempt to Go Through It.

Now that spring is here and the time for high waters, perhaps a suggestion in regard to a handy water gap would be appreciated by the farmers. I think a glance at the illustration will be about all that is necessary to catch the idea. The illustration represents the gap while the water is low. During a flood everything passes over the top. At a glance some might think a water gap made in this way would not turn stock, but I wish to say that if properly made no stock of any kind will attempt going through. The bars or slats should be sunk in the bed of the stream several inches and then spiked securely to the pole which crosses the stream. The pole must also be secured at both ends by means of posts or stakes. Should any drift accumulate on the slats while the water is low, as soon as the water is high enough to flow over the top of the gate, all the drift will be washed over.—Agricultural Epitomist.

NEVER FAILS TO WORK.

Annual Loss of Fertility.

The loss of fertilizer from rains cannot be estimated. The water courses carry millions of tons of plant foods to the sea. The Nile alone pours more than 1,000 tons into the Mediterranean every 24 hours. The annual loss from the earth's soil is greater than the entire deposits of guano, even before they were exhausted. Unless a large portion of the fertilizer is reclaimed from the sea a time may come when the world's average yield of crops will be exceedingly low.

SAYS THERE'S SNOW ON MOON.

Prof. W. H. Pickering Returns from Jamaica with Results of Several Months' Observations.

Prof. W. H. Pickering, of the Harvard observatory, who has been making astronomical observations in Jamaica, West Indies, for several months, has brought a series of photographs of the moon, which appear to establish the interesting fact that there is snow on the moon.

To secure the necessary details the surface of the moon was arbitrarily divided into 16 parts, and there are five pictures of each of the 16 parts. Arranged in series then all the prominence and depressions on the moon's surface appear lighted under five different angles of sunlight, and the astronomer may follow any chosen object of observation under as many conditions of light and shade.

What the snow is can as yet be only a matter of inference. It is most probably the snow of water. It appears that the presence of an atmosphere on the moon is accepted now among astronomers.

Where the Last Bale Lost.

A Memphis traveler who has just returned from a Mississippi tour says he heard two farmers discussing the merits and demerits of the square and round bale gins as he was waiting for a train in a little village of the Bayou state.

"I likes the square bale best," said the lankest specimen of the two, "but they tell me that one bale has to push the other out like the way a hay press works, and I don't think I want to carry my cotton to a gin of that kind long toward the end of the season."

"Why not?" queried the second.

"Well, if I happen to be the last man my bale of cotton would have to stay in that consarned press till the next crop came on and the furst load was ginned, so it could push my bale out of the contraption."—Memphis Scimitar.

"And if you can make a living out of one series of articles so that anything else you sold would be clear profit, you would feel that you were doing pretty well, wouldn't you?"

"Well, in those circumstances I might take the articles at your own valuation."

"My own valuation?"

"Yes—the cost of a living, which you put at ten cents a day."—Chicago Post.

$5,000 REWARD

Owing to the fact that some skeptical people have from time to time questioned the genuiness of the testimonial letters we are constantly publishing, we have deposited with the National City Bank, of Lynn, Mass., $5,000 which will be paid to any person who will show that the following testimonials are not genuine, or were published before obtaining the writers' special permission. — LYDIA E. PINKHAM MEDICINE CO.

How shall a mother who is weak and sick with some female trouble bear healthy children?

How anxious women ought to be to give their children the blessing of a good constitution!

Many women long for a child to bless their home, but because of some debility or displacement of the female organs, they are barren.

Preparation for healthy maternity is accomplished by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound more successfully than by any other medicine, because it gives tone and strength to the parts, curing all displacements and inflammation.

Actual sterility in women is very rare. If any woman thinks she is sterile, let her write to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., whose advice is given free to all expectant or would-be mothers.

Mrs. A. D. Jarret, Belmont, Ohio, writes:

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I must write and tell you what your Vegetable Compound has done for me. Before taking your medicine I was unable to carry babe to maturity, having lost two—one at six months and one at seven. The doctor said next time I would die, but thanks to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, I did not die, but am the proud mother of a six months old girl baby. She weighs nineteen pounds and has never seen a sick day in her life. She is the delight of our home."

Mrs. Whitney's Gratitude.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—From the time I was sixteen years old till I was twenty-three I was troubled with weakness of the kidneys and terrible pains when my monthly periods came on. I made up my mind to try your Vegetable Compound, and was soon relieved. The doctor said I never would be able to go my full time and have a living child, as I was constitutionally weak. I had lost a baby at seven months and half. The next time I continued to take your Compound; and I said then, if I went my full time and my baby lived to be three months old, I should send a letter to you. My baby is now seven months old, and is as healthy and hearty as any one could wish. I cannot express my gratitute to you. I was so bad that I did not dare to go away from home to stay any length of time. Praise God for Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound; and may others who are suffering do as I did and find relief. Wishing you success in the future as in the past, and may many homes be brightened as mine has been."—MRS. L. Z. WHITNEY, 4 Flint St., Somerville, Mass."

Sour Stomach?

Back up a sewer, and you poison the whole neighborhood. Clog up liver and bowels, and your stomach is full of undigested food, which sours and ferments, like garbage in a swill-barrel. That's the first step to untold misery—indigestion, foul gases, headache, furred tongue, bad breath, yellow skin, mental fears, everything that is horrible and nauseating. CASCARETS quietly, positively stop fermentation in the stomach, make the liver lively, tone up the bowels, set the whole machinery going and keep it in order.

Don't hesitate! Take CASCARETS to-day and be saved from suffering!

"After I was induced to try CASCARETS, I will never be without them in the house. My liver was in a very bad shape, and my head ached and I had stomach trouble. Now, since taking Cascarets, I feel fine. My wife has also used them with beneficial results for sour stomach."

DANGER IN THE BOOK

WHY ONE MAN DREADED THE COMING INTO CAMP OF A DICTIONARY.

He Discreetly Left Before the Vociferously Applauded Sentiments He Expressed In His Speech Could Be Analyzed a la Webster.

When the son of the president of the Big Mountain Lumber company came into the mountains to learn the business, so to speak, I knew within 15 minutes that he had come to the wrong place. He was a city chap, newly graduated and thoroughly out of touch with everything mountainous. He was a bright fellow, however, and amply capable, only the mountains were not the field for his development. As time elapsed his distaste grew, and it was all he could do not to express his opinion of the mountain people, their manners, customs, homes, morals and everything connected with them. He was wise enough to confide in me alone and bided his time to get away to some more congenial clime. And he got away sooner than he expected.

It happened that there was a public meeting one night at the sawmill shed, and he was called on to make a few remarks. Every other man at the meeting except myself, who acted as chairman, was of the mountains, and their illiterate talk had roused the young college fellow to the limit. He saw a chance to get even, in his own mind at least, and when the call came for him he responded promptly. His speech, quite brief, but to the point, was as follows, copied from his own manuscript, even the [applause] part:

"My friends, I am glad to meet you on this occasion, for I have wished to say to you publicly what I think of you, though our acquaintance has not been long. Coming as a stranger among you, I was only partly prepared for what was in store. Now, let me say to you that half has not been told me. [Applause.] In the internecine arena your lethiferous conduct has artounded me by the trucidation and occision characterizing it among no men I have ever known. [Loud applause.] In the diversified field of mendacity your efforts would make Machiavelli take to the tall timber. [Uproarious applause.] In all furacious, raptorial and predacious pursuits you have done such wonders that the gifted and great Jonathan Wild would have felt his latrociny was a sounding brass and his direption a tinkling cymbal. [Great applause.] In the broad expanse of labor your torpescent oscitation has made you sui generis among all pandiculate mankind. [Cheers and shouts of "Good for us!"] As good livers, your tables groan beneath their stercoraceous and impetiginous burden, and as drinkers, your temulent bibacity has made the crapulous reputation of Bacchus to be a sign of puritanical abstemiousness. [Loud applause.] As for yourselves, I take pleasure in saying here to you, without fear of successful contradiction, that your nugacity is forever established; as observers of the law, your aberrance is teratological, and personally you are a cohesive concatenation of rubigant exuviæ, that I take especial pleasure in believing does not exist elsewhere on earth. [Vociferous applause.]"

When the enthusiasm had cooled down somewhat, he proceeded to speak on the subjects before the meeting and sat down. The mountaineers were pleased to death with the college man's high flown speech about them, and though I didn't know the meaning of all the big words he used I did know that he had been calling them liars and murderers and thieves and scoundrels and drones and lawless drunkards, besides condemning their fare and anathematizing the lot of them personally. But not one of them suspected, and I was hoping nothing would come of it and they would forget, even if any of the large words were remembered, when one day a book agent drove up to the office in a buckboard and announced that he was selling Webster's Unabridged Dictionary for $2 a copy and showed a sample that was as big as a box of soap.

Nobody had ever seen so much book for the money, nor had anybody ever seen a dictionary in that neighborhood, and when the agent began to tell what a valuable thing it was to be in every family the men became interested, and it wasn't long until the agent had sold 25 copies, to be delivered the following week. When he had gone away with his sample, I called the young man into the private office for consultation.

"Don't say a word," he began as soon as he had closed the door. "I know exactly where I am at, and I'll be some place else before Mr. Webster arrives to throw any light on my recent remarks I am not shedding any tears, and in order that the dictionary buyers and others may know just what I think of them I shall leave two dozen copies of my speech for distribution on the morning of my departure."

He did just as he said he would, and it was a good thing for him that he never came back any more.—W. T. Lampton in Washington Star.

That's All.

"In proof of the assertion that the world is growing better," remarked Optim, "let me mention the fact that we never find stones in the coffee we buy at the grocery stores nowadays."

"No," growled Pessim. "The reason for that is that most persons who buy coffee have it ground when they buy it. The grocers pick out the stones for fear of ruining their mills. The world is growing more enlightened in its selfishness. That's all."—Chicago Tribune.

POPULATION OF MARYLAND 1,178,900.

11,305 Less Than the Federal Count. Baltimore City Gains 5,421.

The population of Maryland is placed at 1,178,900.

The above figures show the results of the new State census, which is now practically complete, and within ten days the official report will be in the hands of the Governor. The population in the city of Baltimore is changed from 508,957 to 514,378; that of the counties from 681,048 to 664,322, and that of the whole State, including Baltimbre city, from 1,190,005 to 1,178,900.

These figures may be relied upon and will be verified by the official report when sent to Governor Smith.

The loss of more than 16,000 in the counties is greater than was anticipated, and means a rearrangement of the representation of in the Legislature of seven counties. Dorchester county, it is said, will be the only one entitled to an additional representative, the increase over the Federal figures being about 300.

The heaviest losses occur in St. Mary's, Anne Arundel, Charles and Baltimore counties. The discrepancy in Anne Arundel county is more than 5,000, in St. Mary's about 1,200, in Baltimore about 1,500 and in Charles about 1,700.

The results in Kent county are very interesting, and when the figures are finally announced, it is said, there may be facts brought to light that will compel a change in the system and method of taking Federal censuses. Both Kent and Prince George's counties are 1,000 short of the Federal figures. Caroline, Queen Anne's, St. Mary's, Wicomico, Dorchester and Harford each made slight gains.

The figures for the State, Baltimore city included, follow:

	State. 1900	Federal.
Allegany	53,825	53,694
Anne Arundel	54,890	60,018
Baltimore county	88,000	90,755

EMPEROR WILKES
TIME, 2.28.

Will stand at the stables of the undersigned in Oakland on the following terms:

$10 to Insure a Mare With Foal.

Money to be paid when mare is known to be with foal. Persons parting with a mare or fails to attend forfeits insurance money. A lien will be retained on the colt until insurance is paid. We will not be responsible for accidents should any occur, but the best of care to prevent such will be exerted.

This horse has a record of 2.34. On a trial he trotted a mile in 2.28. He is a full brother of WILL KERR, 2.07¼, Champion Green Harness Horse of the World, and also of VINETTE, 2.09¼.

EMPEROR WILKES is a dark bay stallion, snip on nose, black points, height 15¼ hands. He was bred by Thompson & Bro., Cynthiana, Ky. He comes from the best trotting family of horses in this country and has a bright future. He is the sire of the fastest colts in Garrett county and is without doubt the best bred stallion and the fastest trotting animal in Western Maryland.

VOLUME 25. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JULY 11, 1901. NUMBER 18.

FOXY WORK FOR GORMAN

In the Background While Lieutenants are Endeavoring to Secure the Legislature for Him.

It is reported that considerable missionary work of a quiet nature is going on among the several Baltimore city factions in the Democratic party in the interest of Mr. Arthur P. Gorman's return to the United States Senate.

From the statement made by a member of the last legislature, there is an excellent prospect of getting the factions together. This gentleman said that Mr. Gorman has been lately more interested in harvesting his wheat on his Howard county farm than in mending his political fences, but that the signs were all favorable that the former senator would have more than a majority of the Democratic legislative candidates when the nominations were made.

The determination to postpone these nominations until after the date of the State convention is simply to find time to clear the political skies in Baltimore and enable the German leaven to do its work. By this delay the missionaries will be able to finish their task, and the result is expected to be united support for Mr. Gorman.

Those who knew Mr. Gorman best were fully satisfied that he would not make a public fight for the United States Senate. This knowledge was not gained by anything that Mr. Gorman had said, but inferred from his natural secretive manner. When the Friedenwald dinner afforded an opportunity for a public declaration which was let pass unheeded, these friends nudged one another as if in full possession of inside information. One prominent Howard county man, whose fealty to the former Senator is a thing of joy, has time and again said that Mr. Gorman would not formally announce his candidacy.

"What is the use of doing so?" he naively remarked. "There is no question about the Senator being the logical candidate. To come out and make the fight against the field would not add any to his strength, but, on the contrary, such action might antagonize certain Democrats who would otherwise fall into line and work hard for the party.

"The coming battle will be no child's play, and every Democratic vote is needed. In the counties the conditions are favorable, while in the city there promises to be required considerable work to harmonize the factions. I understand this work is now going on, not with a loud blare of trumpets, but quietly, as it should.

"There is no necessity at the present time of keeping the world informed of what is going on in the inside. To achieve success in politics the cardinal principle is to find out what the opposition is doing and keep the lattes guessing as to your movements. This is Gorman politics."

The question of how the city factions can be lined up for Mr. Gorman is the one uppermost in the minds of Democrats who are not on the inside.

In addition to the uncertainty as to the Rasin position, there is no love between the Hayes and Morrison forces, so that the missionary work to be done will require more than superficial effort to bring about harmony.

An Aged "Greenback."

The Bankers' Magazine recently printed a facsimile of a Chinese Treasury note of the year 1367, probably the oldest piece of paper money in existence. This note was found last January, along with other valuables, in a bronze statue of Buddha which stood in a temple within the inclosure of the summer palace of the Dowager Empress of China. Italian soldiers engaged in looting broke a hole in the base of the figure, and the paper money tumbled out along with gold, silver and brass coins, lentils, rice, rolls of prayers, etc. The note was issued, according to the printing on it, "by the Board of Revenue of the Emperor Hung Wu in the year 1367" and its value is stated to be worth "250 taels" (about $167). It professed to be "redeemable in silver or bullion."

Besides being the oldest known piece of paper money this treasury note makes it clear that Gutenberg was not the first user of movable type at a date over a hundred years before Gutenberg began to experiment. The German printer was born in 1410, long after the use of movable type in China. It is asserted in fact that the Chinese employed movable type as early as the eleventh century. The British Museum has a Korean book of 1337. Paper money in China dates back to 140 B. C., or earlier. According to Klaproth the earlier bills were made of white stag skin and were a foot square.

CORKSCREW PHILOSOPHY.

Common sense is the basis of all good law.

The more honest the people are the fewer are the laws needed.

A contentious man is the lawyer's best friend.

An honest lawyer seldom has a rascal for a client.

The unjust man always shrieks the loudest for justice.

He who fears the law does well, but he who honors the law does better.

Judge a man by his lawyer and a woman by her doctor. Evil nearly always seeks its kind.

Capital without labor is like dough without yeast; the one may make bread but the other makes more of it.

The greed of capital may do much harm but it carries much good with it. Every ship has to have sailors.

Never envy your neighbor for doing well; turn the tables on him and do better. Keep your ax sharp if you want to cut wood.

Get rich—it matters not how or where, if you do but get rich—by foul or fair; 'tis all the same, your riches will suffice to blind the scrutiny of inquiring eyes.

Take the world as you find it and the rest of the people won't mind it. If you have a swelled head better keep to your bed. If you think the world is all wrong it is time to sing the swan song.

When everything is upside down it is time enough to stand on your head. If you have a cross eyed opinion, straighten your vision with worldly wisdom. Adam had his eyes opened by experience.

Village Improvement Societies.

The ladies of Centreville have organized a Town Improvement Society and will unite their efforts in beautifying and otherwise improving conditions in the pretty metropolis of Queen Anne. Miss Marie McKenney has started the fund by a contribution of $50 and other generous citizens of Centreville doubtless will be equally liberal. The Centreville Record, in commenting upon the work says editorially: "Chestertown furnishes a striking illustration of what may be done if our ladies will only unite and push the movement. Only a few years ago Chestertown was in a worse condition than Centreville, if such a thing is possible, but now it is one of the prettiest towns in the State." Were the ladies of Centreville society to visit Chestertown and see the splendid results of the labors of our women they could but catch an inspiration which would be invaluable to them. Under the progressive impulse given by the ladies, Chestertown has made improvements during the past five years which far outstripped those marking the quarter century which preceded the years in which the impectus given by the ladies was felt. There is no limit to the elevating, beautifying and uplifting influence of determined womanhood. Centreville, we congratulate you upon the fact that the ladies are, as in the case of Chestertown, coming to the rescue. It is delightful to think of your blushing beauty and healthful daintiness when the ladies dedicate you as a perfect work from their hands. The work of your women will not be confined to the specific plans as outlined by the society, but your town officials and public spirited citizens will be stirred by an inspiration to improve and beautify.—Chestertown Transcript.

More Rattlesnakes.

J. B. Vansant, who resides on Tenleigh Manor, west of town, killed three immense rattlesnakes near his home on Tuesday. He brought the "varmints" to town and exhibited them to a number of our residents. They each measured something over three feet in length and were brown in color.

GOOD ROADS IN TENNESSEE.

Colonel J. B. Killebrew's Address Before the Convention at Jackson.

Following is an extract from an address delivered by Colonel J. B. Killebrew before the State Good Roads Convention, at Jacksonville, on June 21:

Gentlemen of the Good Roads Convention: Never has there been a more important convention held in the State of Tennesse than this. It marks the beginning, I hope, of a new and brighter era. It is a movement to increase the profits of the farmers, the railroads and the tradesmen, and to multiply many fold the comforts and pleasures of every citizen. There is no better evidence of a high civilization than good roads. They are the local arteries of traffic, reaching out to fountain heads and gathering the rivulets of trade, which swell the great streams and oceans of commerce, that give employment to millions of people, with a reverting profit to the producers. The heaviest burden the farmers have to endure is that of transportation of their products over bad roads. Prosperous communities are often the result of good roads. And in turn good roads are an index to the prosperity and enlightenment of the community.

Gentlemen of the convention, this is broad in its scope, so important in its consequences, that I scarcely know where to begin. I shall not discuss before you the necessity of good roads, for every man in this convention knows their value. It is estimated by competent publicists that $600,000,000 is expended annually by the farmers of the United States in moving $2,500,000,000 worth of produce over bad roads to railway stations and to markets. This is a tax of 24 cents on every dollar's worth of produce that goes to market. It is further estimated that at least one-half of this may be saved by the use of good roads, or, say, $300,000,000, annually. Looked at from this point of view, it is a question of more vital importance to the people of the state than any other now entering into the policies of the two great parties.

How shall we secure good roads? How shall we save the immense sum now being worse than wasted? Manifestly it will require a great outlay, but the outlay will not be greater than we are now paying without receiving any benefits whatever. Take the amount we now pay by reason of bad roads and apply it to the building of good ones, and we will have an investment that will yield greater returns to the many than any other that can be made. This improvement of our roads ought to be done by the states, by the counties, by the districts, by individuals, by the general government, or by the united action of several or all of these agencies. If this work is to be done by appropriations of the legislature, these appropriations must be made on a liberal scale. Our own state appropriates nothing directly for this purpose, because prohibited by the constitution, but authorizes the counties to do so. Some counties levy a few cents on the hundred dollars, about enough to pay the salaries of the officers intrusted with the management of the fund. A certain number of days' work is also levied, running from five to eight, and those upon whom this tax of labor is levied usually have the least interest in the betterment of the roads, and work in a perfunctory manner so as to discharge the obligation as easily as possible. Districts may not levy a tax under the constitution of the state of Tennessee, however much they may desire to do so. Under the operation of our road laws there is enough waste of time and money to build a section of good roads every year, if it was all levied in money and its expenditure properly directed by competent road builders. But it may be set down as certain that we will never get good roads under our state laws unless these laws provide for a tax by the state, by the counties, by districts, and on the individuals mostly benefited by the construction of the roads.

TO FIX MASON AND DIXON'S LINE.

Maryland and Pennsylvania Authorities Have Survey Made.

The ancient Mason and Dixon's line between Maryland and Pennsylvania is being re-surveyed and will soon be re-marked with iron posts.

The work is being done under the direction of Dr. William B. Clark of the Maryland Geological Bureau, and Secretary of Internal Affairs Latta of Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania legislature in 1899 appropriated $7,000 "to repair and reset the monuments on the boundary line between this commonwealth and the adjacent State of Maryland on the south," and in 1900 the Legislature of Maryland supplied $5,000 to aid in the work.

Mason and Dixon's boundary line, which originally was run and marked to establish the territorial limits of Pennsylvania and Maryland, later became famous as the boundary between the free and slave-holding states of the North and South. It was according to an agreement made in 1732 to run due west from Cape Henlopen (15 miles south of the point now known by that name) to the middle of the peninsula of the Eastern Shore, thence northward tangent to a circle of 12 miles radius, whose centre was at New Castle, Del., and then due north from the tangent point until it reached a parallel of latitude 15 miles south of the southernmost part of Philadelphia. From this point the line was run due west.

Surveyors had already determined the position of the "centre of the peninsula," the north and south line and the "tangent point" when Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, noted English astronomers and mathematicians, arrived in Philadelphia in 1763. From the time of their arrival until December, 1767, Mason and Dixon were busy locating the "southernmost part of Philadelphia," and the northern boundary of Maryland, which they surveyed and marked as far as Dunkard Creek, now in West Virginia, when they were stopped by the Indians.

Along the greater portion of the line each mile was marked by a stone monument, which had the letter "P" engraved or cut on the northern side and the letter "M" on the southern side, while at each fifth mile was a similar stone known as the "crownstone," with the coat-of-arms of the Penns cut on the northern face and with those of Lord Baltimore on the southern. These stones were brought from England.

These monuments, which are to be entirely replaced with cast-iron markers, suffered severely from attacks of vandals in the early days of the last century. Rapid progress is being made in the relocation of the line, and it is expected that a report will be made to the Legislature in 1902 of the completion of the work.

Fatally Burned.

A very sad accident occurred last Tuesday night at the residence of Mr. Geo. Boyles, Jr., who resides in the parsonage building, next door to St. James Episcopal church, Westernport. Mrs. Boyles had in her employ a little 12-year-old girl, as nurse, named Lena Baldwin, whose parents reside at Frankville, on the 17 mile grade. Mr. Boyles arrived home that night about ten o'clock, and shortly afterward the family was alarmed by the cries of the little girl, and on going up stairs it was found that she was on fire, dressed only in her night clothes, the injuries from which she died the next morning. How the accident happened is not known. The house is lit with electricity. All that could be gained from the child was "Matches." The funeral took place Wednesday morning. Interment in Philos cemetery.—Piedmont Herald.

Enterprise Can Win.

It is an encouragement to business men of enterprise and determination that "there is no trade so settled that a vigorous competition cannot take it away by advertising when the established concerns neglect the best methods of publicity." This is the statement of a merchant who built up a great trade from a small beginning by constantly increasing the amount of his advertising.

Wheat and Hoboes.

The proposal of Alderman Goodman that the hoboes, gazaboos, panhandlers and unclassified miscellaneous tramps in these parts shall be sent to Kansas, which is crying for laborers to tackle her enormous harvest, was well meant, but will not be well received by the persons for whose benefit it was made. In fact, it is an attack upon the ambulatory and non-producing "classes." These gentlemen would have no great objection, perhaps, to going west in buffet cars. They appreciate the charms of travel and as citizens of the world they may be able to forgive the country districts. Though they wander far afield at times, they are essentially urban. They find New York an excellent summer resort and they have no wish to leave it, at least, to go to any great distance from it. They have their favorite haunts and benches. The town is their club and place of pleasure. Here and hereabouts they can rest. Area doors are many. There are many unconsidered trifles to be snatched up. Great is the number of kindly hands that cannot resist an appeal for "ten cents for a night's lodging." Food is only too easy. Drink may be had by the knowing at prices that defy competition. "Snipes" cannot elude the quick eye and hand of the tramp who knows his business. He bothers himself little about clothes. Give him fair weather and a lazy or indulgent policeman, and his cup runs over.

To believe that this shuffling philosopher will give up New York, his oyster, and go even with free transportation provided by a benevolent municipality to a state notorious for its austere aversion to the genial wandering life, is to do him an injustice. The question is of more than personal comfort; it touches the solid base of hobo logic. Work is poison to the true tramp. It not only affects him with a physical distaste, but it is a shock to his principles, a violation of his rules of life. There are people enough in the world who like to work, unnatural as it may seem. Let them use their gifts and enjoy their opportunity; but he whose genius is for rest and calm will not expose himself to the insult of being asked to work. He, too, has his conscience and it does not permit him to toil. He has been exposed to many vicissitudes of temperature. His health is more delicate than is commonly supposed. Obliged to be his own physician, that physician tells him that a little over-exertion might be fatal to him, and that he must take the best care of himself. Agricultural labor is plainly unsuited to his constitution. A very little work in a brewery is the utmost that he should venture to undertake.

And what would Kansas do with the imported tramps? Work they will not; to beg they are not ashamed. With rifles and threats of the "rock pile" you might make them go through some clumsy mechanical simulation of labor, but they would run away the moment the severity of the sentinels was relaxed; and they would spoil a great deal more wheat than they would save. Take these gentlemen of the road from this town to the land of the Jayhawkers and other enterprises than harvesting would get their instant attention. They venerate the name of the Hon. Carrie Nation. They would like nothing better than to smash a few saloons and broach a few barrels. For the sake of the peace of the Commonwealth of Kansas, it is best that the New York sons of leisure should keep away. For their own sake it is best also. They have met and mastered many an awful form of liquid fire, but the litter of the blind pig might be too much for them.

Finally, Mr. Goodman should remember that these merry men will be needed here next fall. Tammany cannot afford to lose them. They are sound conservatives and hostile to reform.—N. Y. Sun.

The Best Remedy For Stomach and Bowel Troubles.

"I have been in the drug business for twenty years and have sold most all of the proprietary medicines of any note. Among the entire list I have never found anything to equal Chamberlain's Cholic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy for all stomach and bowel troubles," says O. W. Wakefield, of Columbus, Ga. This remedy cured two severe cases of cholera morbus in my family and I have recommended and sold hundreds of bottles of it to my customers to their entire satisfaction. It affords a quick and sure cure in a pleasant farm. No family should be without it. I keep it in my house at all times." For sale by all dealers.

MARYLAND DAY AT EXPOSITION.

Military Bands Played Patriotic Airs of the Terrapin State.

BUFFALO, N. Y., July 10.—It was Maryland day at the exposition grounds to-day. From innumerable flagpoles floated the orange and black of the old state.

Hundreds of bands played "Maryland, My Maryland," and thousands of Maryland's sons thronged the grounds. No better weather could have been desired. From a cloudless sky the sun shone, his rays being tempered by a brisk breeze from the lake.

With the superior attractions and the pleasant weather the exposition entertained a much larger crowd than usual. Maryland's official representatives were astir early. By 9 o'clock the lobby of the Iriquois hotel was crowded with generals, colonels, and high privates. The morning trains brought in a considerable number of Marylanders and familiar faces were seen on every hand.

Governor Smith and his staff, with the commissioners and other prominent Marylanders, were on hand promptly at 10.30 o'clock, the hour designated for assembly.

The governor's staff made a brave showing, all the members wearing full dress. The abundance of gold lace and the clanking of swords made an inspiring and martial picture.

Carriages were provided for those who took part officially in the events of the day, and they were driven to the grounds, reaching there by noon.

The Temple of Music, a magnificent auditorium in the centre of the grounds, was packed when the Maryland party arrived. Official badges were everywhere to be seen. Hundreds had been distributed by Secretary Forrest of the commission and all were worn. There were also in the auditorium hundreds of Buffalo people and visitors from other places who had been attracted by the Maryland day exercises.

A military band was in attendance, and as Governor Smith and his party reached the stage it struck up "Maryland, My Maryland."

The first strains of the old song brought the crowd to its feet, and the cheering nearly lifted the roof. The air was sung by hundreds.

Director General Buchanan called the assemblage to order with a few words, introducing F. C. Latrobe as presiding officer. The seven-times mayor of Baltimore received an ovation. He told the audience of some of the things in Maryland's record—of Charles Carroll and John Eager Howard, of Frances Scott Key and Winfield Scott Schley.

Of these men and their work Maryland is proud, he said, but in no boastful spirit. Their work belongs to the whole country. But Maryland is a country of peace, and it is interested greatly in the exposition. He hoped that the visit of the representatives of the State would make closer the ties between Maryland and Buffalo.

Major Burns Shot by Son.

Major J. M. Burns, on the retired list of the United States army, and the commandant of the corps of cadets at the University of West Virginia, Morgantown, who is spending his summer at his cottage at Mountain Lake Park, was accidentally shot in the stomach early Sunday morning while taking a bath. His son, aged about 12 years, who had slept with the major the previous night, took hold of a double barrelled shotgun and exploded the charge which passed through a partition, which caused the charge to expend its force else the major would have been killed.

The gun was in the room loaded because of his residence having been entered by burglars on Friday night, and the major had neglected to withdraw the loads. As it is the accident does not amount to a great deal, as the buckshot did not penetrate the skin. Major Burns served on Gen. Crook's staff during the rebellion. He was an officer in the first West Virginia Volunteer Infantry.

Cure For Cholera Infantum—Never Known to Fail.

During last May an infant child of our neighbor was suffering from cholera infantum. The doctors had given up all hopes of recovery. I took a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy to the house, telling them I felt sure it would do good if used according to directions. In two days time the child had fully recovered. The child is now vigorous and healthy. I have recommended this remedy frequently and have never known it to fail.—Mrs. Curtis Baker, Bookwalter, Ohio. TWO CHARIOTS.

This is the chariot known as Fate and these are the horses three.
They are known as Greed, Ambition and

Equal to the Emergency

"I NEVER took any socialistic fads to my bosom," said the Mount Pleasant man with the sun-peeled nose, "until last Sunday, in Atlantic City. Then it struck me that it would be a mighty fine thing if the United States government owned and operated the telegraph lines, so that congress could pass a law making provision for the transmission of money by wire on Sundays as well as on week days. Just why the telegraph companies decline to use the wires on Sunday for the relief of broke persons at distant points from their headquarters is something that I can't understand. A man is as liable to stack up against financial insolvency on Sunday as on any other day of the week, isn't he? And yet, for some inexplicable reason, the telegraph companies won't wire money on Sundays, and if Baron Rothschild were to wake up in Des Moines on a Sunday morning and find himself without enough funds in his clothes to get him through the day, he'd have to try his luck at 'touching' the Des Moines citizens for enough coin to last him until the following morning, for he couldn't get a sou markee by telegraph, no matter how hot he makes the wires.

"This rule of the telegraph companies gave me a pretty warm day of it last Sunday at Atlantic City. I went down there alone on the previous Friday. My wife was not able to accompany me, because she was entertaining a lot of her relatives from the west, and she had already put in three weeks at the seashore, anyhow, earlier in the summer.

"I was floating around on the board walk on Saturday night with a lot of Washington chaps I met down at Atlantic, when in the neighborhood of ten o'clock I put my hand in my breast pocket to get my wallet in order to pay for a round of—er—sarsaparilla. The wallet wasn't there. I did the liveliest hunt through all the rest of my clothes that you ever saw, but the wallet was gone. I had either dropped it, or it had been deftly removed from my inside pocket as I threaded through the crowd on one of the piers. There was about $80 in the wallet, and the Washington chaps with whom I'd been drifting around had seen me skin a bill out of it only about 15 minutes before. But it was absent, all right. My Washington friends wanted to lend me money, but I'm not much on the borrow, except in the most extreme cases, and so I left the crowd, went to my hotel and wired my wife in Washington to telegraph me $50 the first thing on Sunday morning. I didn't know then that telegraph companies refuse to transmit money on Sundays. I went to bed in the serene belief that I'd find in my letter box downstairs on the following morning a notification from one of the telegraph companies that 50 large, iron dollars were awaiting my demand for same with proper identification.

"Instead of that I found a telegram from my wife to this effect:

"'Can't wire money on Sunday. Will try other means.'

"'She can't wire money on Sunday, hey?' I growled to myself 'Well, she's become pretty religious all of a sudden,' and it was some time before the fact began to dawn upon me that it wasn't any newly-formed religious scruples on my wife's part, but a rule of the telegraph companies that made it impossible for her to wire me money on Sunday. I was informed that this was the case when I made inquiry upon the matter at the hotel telegraph office. I was red-hot and fuming. I was flat broke in Atlantic City on Sunday. Moreover, I had to be back in Washington on the following morning, and I hadn't bought a round-trip ticket, and there was my hotel bill to be settled. I'm afraid that I ate my mustache and breathed many sulphurous things with reference to telegraph companies when all of this flashed over me.

"'My wife says in her dispatch that she'll try other means,' I reflected, as I sulked around the hotel veranda after breakfast. 'I wonder what those means are going to be? Maybe she'll take the first train down herself. Maybe she'll send the housemaid down with the money. Maybe she'll tie a purse around the neck of the fox terrier pup and ship him along in the baggage car of the first train. Maybe she'll send it by carrier pigeon. Maybe she'll charter Prof. Langley's airship or aeroplane and fetch it down that way. Maybe she—' but at that point I had to give it up. I was determined not to tackle any of my Washington friends for enough money to see me through until the morning, for that's a kind of business I don't like.

"Well, there I was all that Sunday morning without the price of a dip in the surf in my clothes—without the price of a cigar, for the matter of that. It was the first time I had been able to break away from Washington for a little two or three-day vacation, too, and you can take any odds offered that I was whooping mad.

"A little before one o'clock I was called to the long-distance telephone at the hotel desk. The young woman in the Philadelphia telephone office began to tell me things. She said my wife desired me to go to an Atlantic City physician, whose name she gave me, and whose office, she said, was at such-and-such a number on Atlantic avenue, at two o'clock, where I'd get money. I'd never heard of that particular medical man in my life, and it looked pretty queer. I asked the telephone girl in the Philadelphia office why my wife couldn't talk direct to me, and the girl replied that there was some temporary difficulty with the wires, but that she had repeated my wife's message word for word.

"I couldn't see through it, of course, but at a few minutes before two I left the hotel and started for the office of that medical man on Atlantic avenue, whose name I had never heard. He answered my ring himself and I told him of the business.

"He eyed me pretty suspiciously, I thought, when I had told my little tale. It was plain that he thought that I was either a confidence man or that I was probably peering around his office with a bit of burgling in view.

"'This is all very strange, my dear sir,' said the medical man, still eyeing me sharply. 'I don't know you. I've received no message from anybody in Washington. You can readily see that it would be quite out of the question for me to—er—it is all exceedingly unusual, you know. One has to be very careful at these summer resorts. Perhaps I shall receive a message a little later on,' looking at his watch, which showed the hour to be about half-past two, 'but until then, why—um—it is so unusual that—'

"Oh, there isn't a doubt in life that that man of medicine had it all figured out that I was a porch-climber or something, all right. Fact is, I felt like one. I'll bet I looked as hangdog as I stood there before him, with that flimsy excuse for presenting myself at his office, as if I'd just been arrested for breaking some little girl's arm out of pure devilment.

"I backed out of his office with tottering knees and more internal rage over my idiotic position than I had experienced in a long time, and he closed the door on me with plenty of haughtiness. I was about half a block from his office and saying things under my breath not at all fit for the Sabbath, when a colored man came running after me to tell me that the doctor wanted me to return to his office. I returned all right and found the medical man at the telephone, with all kinds of grins on his face. Well, to cut it short, I'd no sooner left his office than his telephone bell rang and he was called up by my family physician in Washington. The two doctors were old pals and they exchanged funny things over the wire. My wife had gone to our Washington doctor, who lives near us, and asked him what to do, and he had told her that he'd 'phone an old friend in Atlantic City to hand me the money. Then my wife had telephoned me to that effect, as the girl at the Philadelphia telephone office had said. The doctor at Washington had been a little late in telephoning, which caused me the embarrassing five minutes with the doctor in Atlantic City. The latter counted me out the 50 with great cordiality when he got through talking with his old friend, our Washington physician, and he even pressed me to stay to dinner with his family. But I wasn't in a condition of mind to stay to dinner with anybody, and so I just thanked him, went back to the hotel and packed my traps, paid my bill and hiked back to Washington on the first train.

"From now on I'm going to whoop 'er up for government ownership of telegraph lines and Sunday money."—Washington Star.

ALI MOHAMMED MIRZA.

Hereditary Governor General of Azerbaijan and Heir Apparent to the Throne of Persia.

The founder of the persent Kajar dynasty, Agha Mohammed Khan, died in the year 1797, and was succeeded by his nephew, Fath Ali Shah, during whose reign Persia came so often into conflict with her great northern neighbor, and finally, in February, 1828, concluded the treaty of Turkmanchai, which delimitates its present northwest frontier.

The Persian forces, during the wars of 1803-13, and the subsequent war of 1825-27, were commanded by Fath Ali Shah's eldest son, Abbas Mirza, styled

ALI MOHAMMED MIRZA.
(Valiahd of Persia and Governor General of Azerbaijan.)

Naib-es-Sultaneh, who was the first Kajar valiahd to be named governor general of the great northwestern province of Azerbaijan, of which Tabriz is the chief town. This great prince died a few months before his father, in the year 1834, and his son, Mohammed Shah, succeeded to the throne. It has ever since been an unwritten law that the valiahd (or heir-apparent) shall be governor general of Azerbaijan, and shall reside at Tabriz during the whole reign.

Such was the case with Muzaffer-ed-Deen Shah, who succeeded to the throne after the assassination of his father, Nasr-ed-Deen Shah, on May 1, 1896, and arrived in Teheran in June of that year, after having been crowned at Tabriz, where the present valiahd, Ala Mohammed Mirza, remained as governor general.

The valiahd, says London Black and White, was born on July 24, 1872, and is therefore 28 years old. He enjoyed, with his two younger brothers, the advantage of European tuition, of which his enlightened father saw the importance. The prince has acquired a very fair knowledge of French, and is in every way an example of the modern progressive spirit of the last decade in Persia. His highness is anxious to visit Europe, and it is thought likely that the shah may not be adverse to undertaking a journey this year.

The valiahd takes after his father in many ways. He has the same kindly and courteous manner which endears him to all who have the privilege of coming into contact with him. At the same time he seems to have inherited from his grandfather, Nasr-ed-Deen Shah, the firmness of character and strong constitution which distinguished the shah who was so well known in Europe. He has at the same time inherited from both his ancestors that passion for sport and outdoor exercise which has for generations been the lament of the weakly and indolent courtiers who, at all times and in all weathers, have been obliged, at a moment's notice, to accompany their royal masters on fatiguing shooting expeditions in the rocky mountains which surround the capital.

As a means of comparison, what are said to be the smallest lady's sailor hat and the smallest man's straw are held up for comparison with this giant, which measures 7½ feet across the brim and three feet around the crown.

Rare Excitement in Kansas.

There was a lively time in Ellenwood, Kan., when a mad bull dashed through the town. The men fled to halls and stairways, leaving the women on the streets exposed to peril. On the following day a jackrabbit scampered over the same course, and the male population bravely chased it for four miles, while the women fled in terror.

BLACK EYE EXPLAINED.

Inquisitive Stranger Wanted to Know Too Much About a Boxer's Optic.

I had gone into the gymnasium to inquire about a punching bag, and, seeing a man there with a black eye, I asked if he had met with an accident, says a Chicago Daily News writer.

"I'll tell you what's de matter wid me," he explained after a bit. "I was a-boxin' here two or three days ago wid de St. Joe Kid, as he calls hisself, and he struck me foul and blackened me eye. I'm a-layin' for him here dis mornin', and if he comes, say, I'll put him to sleep in de middle of de first round. I'll show you how he hit me."

He got up, pulled off his coat and vest and pulled on a pair of gloves, and about this time I remarked:

"I'm perfectly willing to take your word for it. You needn't go to any trouble to demonstrate."

"Oh, it's no trouble 'tall. Come into de ring and I'll show you how he did it."

"But, you see, I—"

"Come into de ring. What's de use of askin' about me eye if you don't want to know how de kid blackened it?"

He had gone to considerable trouble on my account, and I felt it was only fair to step into the ring.

"Now, den, put up yer dukes," he said, as he squared off at me.

"But, my dear sir, I never—"

"Put up yer dukes! Do you want me to knock yer jaw off at de very first clip?"

It looked to me as if he was an only child and not used to being crossed, and so I put up my dukes to keep him good-natured.

"Now, prance around," he said, as he began to dance and skip and feint at me.

"What's the use?" I protested. "I can stand still while you explain matters."

"Prance!" he yelled.

It seemed policy to humor him in his absurd theories, and so I began prancing.

"Dat's de idea," he called, as he dodged about. "Now, den, hold yer right a little lower. Dat's it. Up a little wid yer left. Dat's de way."

"But I assure you, my dear fellow, that I didn't come here to—"

"Lead for me wid yer left."

"What for?"

"Lead for me, I say. Do you want to stand dere like a chump and let me do all de work?"

I didn't want to hurt the young man, but as he was willing to take the risks I led for him. I expected to knock him head over heels, but he was still circling around me after I got through leading. This astonishing fact led me to remark:

"I think I will go now. I've got to be down at the house in just 15 minutes. I can plainly see now how the kid—"

"Swing yer right for me jaw!" he yelled, as his dancing and prancing grew more vigorous.

"But I don't want to break your jaw."

"Swing wid yer right!"

He had requested me to kill him, and I swung. I was wondering what the coroner's verdict would be when the roof fell in and everything turned dark. It was eight minutes afterward, as a small boy with a very honest face informed me, when I awoke and found the roof all right. The boy and I were the only ones in the place, and he said my jaw wouldn't bother me over two weeks. He was a good boy. He rubbed me with liniment, brought me a glass of brandy and afterward helped me downstairs, called a carriage and told the driver what hospital to bring up at.

THE FORTUNE TELLER.

Consulting This Personage Is a Bit of Americanized Italian Superstition.

Volumes have been written about the educated foreigner's impressions of America, and not infrequently a writer of more or less prominence feels called upon to interpret the vague bewilderment of the newly arrived peasant. But in spite of the multiplication of books the curious attitude of the ignorant immigrant toward what are to Americans the commonplaces of life is little realized, and is amazing and amusing when discovered, says the New York Tribune.

The other day there came into a large uptown market a little Italian woman, with shawl wrapped closely around an anxious face. She looked about timidly until some one asked her what she wanted. "Da fortune teller," was the eager reply.

"Fortune teller? Why, there's no fortune teller here."

"Oh, yas, yas," she repeated. She was desperately in earnest; so much so that the man good naturedly said:

"Well, I'll go try to find out where she is for you."

"No she! No she!" was the hurried interruption, and held up a penny. "Drop-a da cent," she explained.

"Gee whiz!" cried the man to an interested friend; "she means the weighing machine!"

He pointed out to the anxious soul one of those machines which tell your weight and your fortune and render a musical selection, all for one cent. The old woman took her stand, dropped her penny, and seized eagerly upon the little card which dropped out, hurrying away to some friend, who would interpret for her the mystic words.

"Queer old lady!" gasped the market man. "Wonder if she's going to 'be successful in speculation' or 'marry a blond gentleman.'"

Mental Dyspepsia.

Envy is the dyspepsia of the mind.—Chicago Daily News.

"Now Dont Get the Blues."

When a cheerful, brave and light-hearted woman is suddenly plunged into that perfection of misery, the blues, it is a sad picture.

It is usually this way:

She has been feeling out of sorts for some time, experiencing severe headache and backache; sleeps very poorly and is exceedingly nervous.

Sometimes she is nearly overcome by faintness, dizziness, and palpitation of the heart; then that bearing-down feeling is dreadfully wearing.

Her husband says, "Now, don't get the blues! You will be all right after you have taken the doctor's medicine."

But she does not get all right. She grows worse day by day, until all at once she realizes that a distressing female complaint is established.

Her doctor has made a mistake.

She loses faith; hope vanishes; then comes the morbid, melancholy, everlasting blues. She should have been told just what the trouble was, but probably she withheld some information from the doctor, who, therefore, is unable to accurately locate her particular illness.

Mrs. Pinkham has relieved thousands of women from just this kind of trouble, and now retains their grateful letters in her library as proof of the great assistance she has rendered them. This same assistance awaits every sick woman in the land.

Mrs. Winifred Allender's Letter.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I feel it my duty to write and tell you of the benefit I have received from your wonderful remedies. Before taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, I was a misery to myself and every one around me. I suffered terrible pain in my back, head, and right side, was very nervous, would cry for hours. Menses would appear sometimes in two weeks, then again not for three or four months. I was so tired and weak, could not sleep nights, sharp pains would dart through my heart that would almost cause me to fall.

"My mother coaxed me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I had no faith in it, but to please her I did so. The first bottle helped me so much that I continued its use. I am now well and weigh more than I ever did in my life."—MRS. WINIFRED ALLENDER, Farmington, Ill.

TWO CHARIOTS.

This is the chariot known as Fate and these are the horses three.
They are known as Greed, Ambition and Strife, and the wind is not more free.
They are coursing the vast arena of life and their goal is Destiny.

And who is it rides so swift away, O! who may the driver be?
Stern shows his face through the clouds of dust—look and your eyes will see
The form of a daring rider there, and his name is Enmity.

Now, these are the horses black as night, and the driver fierce is he;
They feel the pitiless lash of pride as onward they swiftly flee—
For he seeks the glittering goal beyond, the goal that is Destiny.

But look, where another chariot goes and

Their driver he drives with a gentle hand and Love his name shall be,
For the horses he drives are Faith and Hope, and the third is Charity.

White as the foam that wets their lips are Love's swift horses three;
They, too, are rounding the course of life toward the goal that is Destiny;
But they trample no roses under their feet and none from their pathway flee.

Where Enmity's chariot wheels have been

I returned all right and found the medical man at the telephone, with all kinds of grins on his face. Well, to cut it short, I'd no sooner left his office than his telephone bell rang and he was called up by my family physician in Washington. The two doctors were old pals and they exchanged funny things over the wire. My wife had gone to our Washington doctor, who lives near us, and asked him what to do, and he had told her that he'd 'phone an old friend in Atlantic City to hand me the money. Then my wife had telephoned me to that effect, as the girl at the Philadelphia telephone office had said. The doctor at Washington had been a little late in telephoning, which caused me the embarrassing five minutes with the doctor in Atlantic City. The latter counted me out the 50 with great cordiality when he got through talking with his old friend, our Washington physician, and he even pressed me to stay to dinner with his family. But I wasn't in a condition of mind to stay to dinner with anybody, and so I just thanked him, went back to the hotel and packed my traps, paid my bill and hiked back to Washington on the first train.

"From now on I'm going to whoop 'er up for government ownership of telegraph lines and Sunday money."—Washington Star.

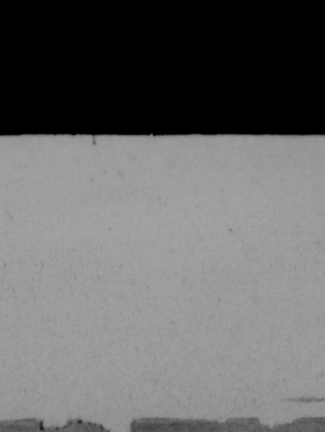
ALI MOHAMMED MIRZA.

Hereditary Governor General of Azerbaijan and Heir Apparent to the Throne of Persia.

The founder of the persent Kajar dynasty, Agha Mohammed Khan, died in the year 1797, and was succeeded by his nephew, Fath Ali Shah, during whose reign Persia came so often into conflict with her great northern neighbor, and finally, in February, 1828, concluded the treaty of Turkmanchai, which delimitates its present northwest frontier.

The Persian forces, during the wars of 1803-13, and the subsequent war of 1825-27, were commanded by Fath Ali Shah's eldest son, Abbas Mirza, styled



ALI MOHAMMED MIRZA.
(Valiahd of Persia and Governor General of Azerbaijan.)

Naib-es-Sultaneh, who was the first Kajar valiahd to be named governor general of the great northwestern province of Azerbaijan, of which Tabriz is the chief town. This great prince died a few months before his father, in the year 1834, and his son, Mohammed Shah, succeeded to the throne. It has ever since been an unwritten law that the valiahd (or heir-apparent) shall be governor general of Azerbaijan, and shall reside at Tabriz during the whole reign.

Such was the case with Muzaffer-ed-Deen Shah, who succeeded to the throne after the assassination of his father, Nasr-ed-Deen Shah, on May 1, 1896, and arrived in Teheran in June of that year, after having been crowned at Tabriz, where the present valiahd, Ala Mohammed Mirza, remained as governor general.

The valiahd, says London Black and White, was born on July 24, 1872, and is therefore 28 years old. He enjoyed, with his two younger brothers, the advantage of European tuition, of which his enlightened father saw the importance. The prince has acquired a very fair knowledge of French, and is in every way an example of the modern progressive spirit of the last decade in Persia. His highness is anxious to visit Europe, and it is thought likely that the shah may not be adverse to undertaking a journey this year.

The valiahd takes after his father in many ways. He has the same kindly and courteous manner which endears him to all who have the privilege of coming into contact with him. At the same time he seems to have inherited from his grandfather, Nasr-ed-Deen Shah, the firmness of character and strong constitution which distinguished the shah who was so well known in Europe. He has at the same time inherited from both his ancestors that passion for sport and outdoor exercise which has for generations been the lament of the weakly and indolent courtiers who, at all times and in all weathers, have been obliged, at a moment's notice, to accompany their royal masters on fatiguing shooting expeditions in the rocky mountains which surround the capital.

As a means of comparison, what are said to be the smallest lady's sailor hat and the smallest man's straw are held up for comparison with this giant, which measures 7½ feet across the brim and three feet around the crown.

Rare Excitement in Kansas.

There was a lively time in Ellenwood, Kan., when a mad bull dashed through the town. The men fled to halls and stairways, leaving the women on the streets exposed to peril. On the following day a jackrabbit scampered over the same course, and the male population bravely chased it for four miles, while the women fled in terror.

BLACK EYE EXPLAINED.

Inquisitive Stranger Wanted to Know Too Much About a Boxer's Optic.

I had gone into the gymnasium to inquire about a punching bag, and, seeing a man there with a black eye, I asked if he had met with an accident, says a Chicago Daily News writer.

"I'll tell you what's de matter wid me," he explained after a bit. "I was a-boxin' here two or three days ago wid de St. Joe Kid, as he calls hisself, and he struck me foul and blackened me eye. I'm a-layin' for him here dis mornin', and if he comes, say, I'll put him to sleep in de middle of de first round. I'll show you how he hit me."

He got up, pulled off his coat and vest and pulled on a pair of gloves, and about this time I remarked:

"I'm perfectly willing to take your word for it. You needn't go to any trouble to demonstrate."

"Oh, it's no trouble 'tall. Come into de ring and I'll show you how he did it."

"But, you see, I—"

"Come into de ring. What's de use of askin' about me eye if you don't want to know how de kid blackened it?"

He had gone to considerable trouble on my account, and I felt it was only fair to step into the ring.

"Now, den, put up yer dukes," he said, as he squared off at me.

"But, my dear sir, I never—"

"Put up yer dukes! Do you want me to knock yer jaw off at de very first clip?"

It looked to me as if he was an only child and not used to being crossed, and so I put up my dukes to keep him good-natured.

"Now, prance around," he said, as he began to dance and skip and feint at me.

"What's the use?" I protested. "I can stand still while you explain matters."

"Prance!" he yelled.

It seemed policy to humor him in his absurd theories, and so I began prancing.

"Dat's de idea," he called, as he dodged about. "Now, den, hold yer right a little lower. Dat's it. Up a little wid yer left. Dat's de way."

"But I assure you, my dear fellow, that I didn't come here to—"

"Lead for me wid yer left."

"What for?"

"Lead for me, I say. Do you want to stand dere like a chump and let me do all de work?"

I didn't want to hurt the young man, but as he was willing to take the risks I led for him. I expected to knock him head over heels, but he was still circling around me after I got through leading. This astonishing fact led me to remark:

"I think I will go now. I've got to be down at the house in just 15 minutes. I can plainly see now how the kid—"

"Swing yer right for me jaw!" he yelled, as his dancing and prancing grew more vigorous.

"But I don't want to break your jaw."

"Swing wid yer right!"

He had requested me to kill him, and I swung. I was wondering what the coroner's verdict would be when the roof fell in and everything turned dark. It was eight minutes afterward, as a small boy with a very honest face informed me, when I awoke and found the roof all right. The boy and I were the only ones in the place, and he said my jaw wouldn't bother me over two weeks. He was a good boy. He rubbed me with liniment, brought me a glass of brandy and afterward helped me downstairs, called a carriage and told the driver what hospital to bring up at.

THE FORTUNE TELLER.

Consulting This Personage Is a Bit of Americanized Italian Superstition.

Volumes have been written about the educated foreigner's impressions of America, and not infrequently a writer of more or less prominence feels called upon to interpret the vague bewilderment of the newly arrived peasant. But in spite of the multiplication of books the curious attitude of the ignorant immigrant toward what are to Americans the commonplaces of life is little realized, and is amazing and amusing when discovered, says the New York Tribune.

The other day there came into a large uptown market a little Italian woman, with shawl wrapped closely around an anxious face. She looked about timidly until some one asked her what she wanted. "Da fortune teller," was the eager reply.

"Fortune teller? Why, there's no fortune teller here."

"Oh, yas, yas," she repeated. She was desperately in earnest; so much so that the man good naturedly said:

"Well, I'll go try to find out where she is for you."

"No she! No she!" was the hurried interruption, and held up a penny. "Drop-a da cent," she explained.

"Gee whiz!" cried the man to an interested friend; "she means the weighing machine!"

He pointed out to the anxious soul one of those machines which tell your weight and your fortune and render a musical selection, all for one cent. The old woman took her stand, dropped her penny, and seized eagerly upon the little card which dropped out, hurrying away to some friend, who would interpret for her the mystic words.

"Queer old lady!" gasped the market man. "Wonder if she's going to 'be successful in speculation' or 'marry a blond gentleman.'"

Mental Dyspepsia.

Envy is the dyspepsia of the mind.—Chicago Daily News.

"Now Dont Get the Blues."

When a cheerful, brave and light-hearted woman is suddenly plunged into that perfection of misery, the blues, it is a sad picture.

It is usually this way:

She has been feeling out of sorts for some time, experiencing severe headache and backache; sleeps very poorly and is exceedingly nervous.

Sometimes she is nearly overcome by faintness, dizziness, and palpitation of the heart; then that bearing-down feeling is dreadfully wearing.

Her husband says, "Now, don't get the blues! You will be all right after you have taken the doctor's medicine."

But she does not get all right. She grows worse day by day, until all at once she realizes that a distressing female complaint is established.

Her doctor has made a mistake.

She loses faith; hope vanishes; then comes the morbid, melancholy, everlasting blues. She should have been told just what the trouble was, but probably she withheld some information from the doctor, who, therefore, is unable to accurately locate her particular illness.

Mrs. Pinkham has relieved thousands of women from just this kind of trouble, and now retains their grateful letters in her library as proof of the great assistance she has rendered them. This same assistance awaits every sick woman in the land.

Mrs. Winifred Allender's Letter.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I feel it my duty to write and tell you of the benefit I have received from your wonderful remedies. Before taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, I was a misery to myself and every one around me. I suffered terrible pain in my back, head, and right side, was very nervous, would cry for hours. Menses would appear sometimes in two weeks, then again not for three or four months. I was so tired and weak, could not sleep nights, sharp pains would dart through my heart that would almost cause me to fall.

"My mother coaxed me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I had no faith in it, but to please her I did so. The first bottle helped me so much that I continued its use. I am now well and weigh more than I ever did in my life."—MRS. WINIFRED ALLENDER, Farmington, Ill.

A SOUL RECLAIMED.

Whisky Made a Tramp of John Lester and a Kindly Friendship Saved Him.

Only a tramp—a poor unhappy creature, a burden to himself and a terror to others. He had slept on the hay in a farmer's barn, from which he had risen, before anyone was astir, stiff and unrefreshed; he had already been refused a breakfast two or three times; but, hardest to bear, he had been for 24 hours without a drink of liquor.

He passed down the little incline in the road and paused by the brook. Its rush and tinkle as it skipped down the stones and glided away under the grassy borders reminded him of the brook at the foot of the meadow which he always crossed on his way to school.

At this moment the sound of a horse's feet and the roll of wheels fell on his ear, and then a cheery voice saying:

"Good morning, my friend. As we are traveling the same way, allow me to give you a lift."

Friend, whose friend? He had been no man's friend, not even his own, for years, but he replied:

"Thank you, but I am not fit for a seat in your carriage."

The gentleman threw back his lap robe, saying: "I think Jack can take us both up the hill more easily than you can walk."

Impelled by the kind voice and magnetic smile, the tramp took the vacant seat, and they rode on in silence for awhile, save some remark on the beauty of the morning. Just before them the long hill, where the road wound up and down for nearly a mile. As they began the ascent they met a party of gentlemen coming down, all of whom greeted his companion in the most courteous manner, and as they passed them he asked:

WHISKY MADE HIM A TRAMP.

"Sir, are you not ashamed to be seen riding with a tramp?"

Never while he lives will he forget the look in the fine dark eyes turned toward him as his unknown friend replied:

"May I answer your question with another? Will you tell me what made you a tramp?"

"Whisky," was the brief answer.

"Ah, he is a cruel master. How long have you served him?"

"I took my first drink of liquor at a class banquet seven years ago this month. The result is before you."

"So you have given this hard master seven years of your manhood with all their glorious possibilities, your early hopes and ambitions for a noble, useful life, home, friends, happiness. And what have you in return?"

The kindly interest in the voice and manner reached the heart of the poor tramp, and in a trembling voice he replied:

"Nothing, sir, nothing. Brought up in a Christian home, graduated with honor from college, married to a lovely wife, whisky has robbed me of everything and in return given me broken health, a ruined, disgraced manhood and the privilege of tramping through the country begging my bread from door to door."

The eyes of the tramp were full of tears, his face quivering with grief. After a moment's silence the gentleman asked earnestly:

"Have you had enough of this mistaken way of living? Do you want to try for a better life and make the effort to regain what you have lost?"

"Do I want to do this? Oh, sir, does a sinner in hell want to enter Heaven? But it is impossible; I am friendless and hopeless, too weak to depend on myself. From the depth to which I have fallen there is no way up."

The gentleman laid one hand kindly on the ragged shoulder as he replied:

"My poor boy, there is always a way up if one really desires to reform. The way may be rough and hard, but your Heavenly Father stands with open arms to receive you if you but turn to Him, and all that a brother could do for you, I am here to do, to help you back to a sober manhood."

Thus it came about that John Lester, no longer a tramp, entered the home of this good Samaritan and began his fight for life. It would be impossible to tell the agony of the months that followed—the constant struggle day and night with the terrible enemy, who sought in every way to overcome the weak will and weaker body; the tears and prayers and frantic clinging to the one friend who stood like a strong wall between him and utter hopelessness. Added to the constant struggle with this fearful appetite were haunting memories, like ghosts, continually about him, memories of lost opportunities, blasted reputations, a broken-hearted mother, a deserted wife and days and nights of debauchery so fearful that he trembled at the thought of them. At last, led by the kind hand that never faltered, sustained by the true heart that never failed him, he came up from the depths, and, trusting alone in the love of God to keep, began his new life. One bright day the forsaken wife, who, although she had suffered so much, was brave enough and loving enough to forgive, came to him, and together they went home and began their united life again.

The good Samaritan has gone to his reward. The good which he accomplished lives after him. To-day John Lester is a noble Christian man, caring for the friendless, lifting the fallen, binding up the broken hearted. There are none so lost or neglected but he has for them a helping hand, as he humbly strives from day to day to follow the grand life of Him who came into the world to save the sinner, even though he be "only a tramp!"—Lael Clark, in Christian Herald.

DRINKING FOR THE EFFECT.

Experiments of Dr. Starr and Pertinent Suggestions by the Kansas City Times.

To the many uninformed people who insist on drinking strong liquors "not because they like the taste, but are fond of the effects," the discoveries made by Dr. Allen Starr as to the quality of mental mood produced in the drinker by different sorts of beverages may prove instructive.

In a recent article in the Medical Record he says that the result of careful investigation has led him to conclude that in the majority of individuals sherry produces a quarrelsome disposition, while, on the other hand, port tends to exert a soothing effect. Champagne causes apparently a decided exhilaration of the flow of thought, while Burgundy makes one think more slowly and by no means adds to the feeling of conviviality.

Whisky, brandy and gin have entirely different effects on the individual, but Dr. Starr will not undertake to classify their manifestations with reference to any large number of persons.

The fact of the matter is he cannot do so; for each one of these beverages produces an effect upon the individual who may absorb them in overdoses that is in inverse ratio to the sober temperament of the absorber and in diametric opposition to every rule of psychology that was ever laid down. Four drinks of brandy may make a usually taciturn individual talk like a house afire, while five drinks of gin may put an alert and hustling man into a state of paralysis. Eleven drinks of whisky may set a normally peace-loving citizen to fighting every wooden Indian and police telephone box he comes across, and a mixture of all three of these brands of liquor during the progress of a spree may turn the most profane and irreligious man into a singer of hymns and a spouter of Gospel texts and scraps of sermons.

If the large number of experimenting persons, who insist on drinking liquor without reference to quantity or quality or age or character for its "effects" and not for its "taste," would take the precaution to have the different stages of their "jags" portrayed by phonographers and photographers, engaged especially to follow them from barroom to buffet, and from beer saloon to alehouse, they might secure a collection of data that, when examined in moments of stern and reflective sobriety, would serve more effectively to prevent a recurrence of their experimentation than all the cures for alcoholism ever invented.

NEWS AND COMMENT.

The saloon is a legalized drunkard factory.—Christian Work.

The statement is made on medical authority that more deaths are due in England to alcoholism than to diphtheria or typhoid fever.

Twenty-nine of the thirty saloonkeepers of Kokomo, Ind., were arrested on March 7 for having screens at their doors and windows at forbidden hours. All will plead guilty and pay fines.

When a daily paper states that "members of congress are terrorized by the temperance vote," it shows what agitation has accomplished. It gives proof of cheering progress in the war against liquor and speaks of greater victories near at hand.—Union Signal.

A novel method of controlling the drinking habit is being considered by the Arkansas legislature. If a proposed measure becomes law it will prohibit any person from drinking whisky until he has obtained a $5 license from the county clerk of the county in which he resides.

A saloon license was granted in a Pennsylvania town in a building formerly used as a trunk factory. Over the door was a big sign: "Trunk Factory." The saloonkeeper asked a prohibition painter to change the sign to suit his business at the least possible cost. The painter took his brush and simply carried it around the cross line of the "T," making the sign to read "Drunk Factory."—National Advocate.

Sues Saloonkeeper.

Mrs. Lillie Rich, of Wichita, Kan., has brought suit against John Kinseder, a saloonkeeper, for $10,000. She alleges that the defendant has sold liquor to her sons, 15 and 13 years old, respectively, until they had a confirmed appetite for liquor, which has ruined their usefulness as support and companionship to plaintiff.

THE ROMAN PONTIFF.

Looks Forward to Living to the Close of 1903.

Wants to Round Out a Quarter of a Century of His Pontificate and Half a Century of His Cardinalate.

[Special Correspondence.]

POPE LEO XIII., according to a cable message recently received from Rome, has expressed to his intimates the conviction that he would live until late in the year 1903, when, on December 19, he proposes to celegrate the fiftieth anniversary of his elevation to the cardinalate in a manner befitting so rare and distinguished an event. From time to time the newspapers spread the report that the venerable pontiff is at death's door, but from a church dignitary who has seen him several times within the past decade it is learned that he seems to be about as robust now as he was ten years ago.

Pope Leo is one of the most remarkable—if not the most remarkable—men of our age. His character is a rare combination of firmness and gentleness, and with these virtues is combined a brilliant mind, whose grand thoughts have challenged the admiration of thinking men of every creed. Contemporary critics have dealt gently with the aged ruler of the church. They have, almost without exception, given him praise for honesty of purpose and sincerity of intent; the most notable exception being Marie Corelli, who, in "The Master Christian," draws a picture of his holiness which depicts him as an old, old man governed by senile prejudice and the advice of self-seeking sycophants. Miss Corelli's delineation of Leo's character is ridiculed by churchmen, who assert that the pope is ruler of church in fact as well as name, and that personal considerations never enter into his decisions; and until the talented woman novelist furnishes more proof than mere assertion the world will be inclined to accept the estimate of the pope's associates rather than hers.

The biography of the head of the Roman Catholic church demonstrates that genuine merit, combined with an understanding of the value and power of organization, is the keystone of success in the ecclesiastical as well as the business world. Vincenzo Gioacchino Pecci, the son of Count Ludovico Pecci and his wife, Anna Prosperi, was born March 2, 1810, at Carpineto, in the Papal States. At the age of eight he was placed in the Jesuit college of Viterbo, where he remained six years and distinguished himself for ability and propriety of conduct. His mother dying at the end of this time, in 1824, his father took him to Rome, and in November of that year placed him in the celebrated Roman college. Here his great talents and earnest application were strongly impressed upon his instructors, who were delighted when, at the age of 18, he took the first prize in physico-chemistry. Following this, he took a complete course in philosophy, receiving the laurea in 1831. He then entered the college of Noble Ecclesiastics and learned canon and civil law in the schools of the Roman university. After becoming a doctor of laws, he was appointed by Pope Gregory XVI. a domestic prelate and referendary of the signature, March 16, 1837, his priesthood being confirmed in the chapel of the vicariate December 23, 1837. At this time, although but 27 years of age, he was admitted to be one of the first scholars of Rome.

THE POPE'S SEDAN CHAIR.

Pope Gregory speedily recognized the young priest's executive ability by making him apostolic delegate at Benevento, Perugia and Spoleto, in each of which places his administration was marked by great energy and strong common sense. In the first place he suppressed brigandage, which had been the cause of endless disorder, and thereby won the everlasting gratitude of the law-abiding portion of the community.

Designing him for the diplomatic service, for which his great talents and aristocratic bearing preeminently fitted him, Gregory made him, on January 17, 1843, titular archbishop of Damiettea, in order that he might be qualified for the office of nuncio to Belgium. He remained three years at Brussels, discharging the duties pertaining to his delicate post with great tact and to the highest satisfaction of his master who then, in 1845, just a few months before his own death, bestowed on him the see of Perugia.

Pecci's talents made a strong impression upon the success of Gregory, Pius IX., and at the consistory held December 19, 1853, he was, at the age of 43, created a cardinal. Twenty-four years later, in which interval he had rendered the most faithful services to the church, he was selected to fill the most responsible position of cardinal camerlengo of the Roman hierarchy. He was then a man of 67, yet he did not hesitate when thus summoned to assume the weighty obligations resting upon the pope's chief executive officer. Five months later Pius IX. was gathered to his fathers, and the new camerlengo was compelled to assume all the temporal duties of the papal office. Pius died February 7, 1878, and 21 days later Pecci succeeded him under the name of Leo XIII. Sixty-two cardinals were in attendance upon this notable conclave, yet so universally were the merits of Pecci recognized, and so general was the demand that he become head of the church, that not a single vote was cast against him.

In the matter of dress, the venerable pontiff is punctilious, his wardrobe being one of great magnificence. For ordinary wear he has a white robe, made in winter of fine cloth, in summer of moire silk. When he goes into the garden he throws over this a long mantle of red cloth, which has a border of gold embroidery. When dressed for private ceremonies he wears a surplice made of costly lace, and a red pelerine, of cloth in winter and of satin in summer. For great festivals he first puts on the "falda," a wide seamless coat of white satin, around which is tied a broad striped sash of gold, red and white. Above this is a beautiful garment covered with jewels, and last comes a mantle of gold-embroidered velvet. On his feet the pope always wears red velvet shoes. In addition to his episcopal ring the pope is fond of wearing other costly rings, often composed of single stones of great beauty. He seldom dons the pontifical tiara, which is a threefold golden crown, lined with red, green and blue velvet, and covered with priceless jewels. For great ceremonies his costume is so heavy that it is impossible for him, at his great age, to stand or walk, and he is carried in a chair. When he visits the Vatican garden he is carried thither in a sedan chair of an old-fashioned pattern.

Like almost every other human being the pope has a hobby—the writing of poetry. Most of his verses are written in Latin, and eminent critics have pronounced them among the finest specimens of modern poetry. Few of his productions are given to the public, however; and only one volume of his poems has been printed since his accession to the papacy.

The large picture which graces this article is taken directly from the latest photograph of his holiness, and comes from the studio of Cane Conyugi at Rome.

SUNLIGHT IN THE HOME.

Neither Children Nor Adults Can Be Expected to Thrive in a Darkened, Gloomy Room.

Some people seem averse to having the sunlight enter their rooms. They do not realize that apartments in which a person spends any considerable part of the day should be frequently refreshed and brightened by the free entrance of health-giving sunshine. Light is something that can be neither bought nor sold, bartered nor exchanged, and is free to all; so why not make use of it to the most extreme limit of its value? A good part of our lives is spent within doors, in rooms whose windows are screened by drapings and curtains and blinds, all for the adornment of the interior, as well as for the pleasing effect when viewed from the outside. These rooms are, in many instances, lighted by windows so caparisoned that their real value is detracted from by their interior embellishments. The blinds are often so low down that the room is practically always in darkness or in gloom, facilitating the growth and production of the denizens of the germ world. The healthiest and most habitable part of the house is set apart for reception days and important occasions, whilst the least acceptable portion becomes the scene of everyday habitation. Arrange your rooms so that those in which the occupants spend the most of their time are the sunniest and most cheerful. If we cannot have the direct rays of the sun sweep through our houses now and again through the day, we must be content with the indirect rays, but of these there are unlimited supplies. The house on the north side of the street should have the most frequently occupied rooms in front, while that built on the south side of the street should have all the pleasant and most habitable rooms in the rear. If on the west or eastern side, the rooms should be arranged, more or less proportionally equally in front and rear. A darkened room is not productive of good health, and children or adults cannot be expected to thrive in it any more than a flower will grow and thrive amid perpetual gloom.—N. Y. Weekly.

THE ASEPTIC PILLOW.

New Method of Fighting Germs of Various Diseases, Recommended by Medical Men.

The pillow stuffed with pine needles, with poppy leaves, or with eucalyptus leaves and shavings must give way to the aseptic pillow which now threatens to change every Christian bed into a quasi-hospital.

The new aid to health is a double pillow, or really one pillow which has been split longitudinally. In the center of each half is a pocket filled with dried sponge, Japanese sponge, or similar material. Upon this the owner pours such drug or combination of drugs as may be required by his physical system. According to the new idea each destructive germ has its own specific antidote, and every kind of sore or diseased tissue its own particular remedy. Camphor oil and camphoric acid and listerine are among the favorite preparations. All are strongly aromatic, and all possess a germicide character. When the pillow is not in use the diffusion is small, but when the owner is lying down the heat of the head and body and the movement of the sleeper increase the evaporation and charge all the air around the pillow with a small percentage of the aseptic. For those to whom any one of the substances is distasteful there are strong essential oils which can be added to conceal the savor. While the new project is a great deal of a fad, it nevertheless accomplishes much in particular cases. For coughs, colds and coryzas it seems to be very beneficial.—N. Y. Evening Post.

New Aerial War Torpedo.

A new war topedo for use in the air is impelled by its own force. After being started by a torpedo gun this novel projectile flies by a force caused by gas escaping from it. This gas is generated by a slow-burning material within the missile. At trials made so far the new torpedo has gone a distance of 16,000 feet. The inventor is a Swedish major, Mr. Unge, and the German government is paying for the experiments.

THURSDAY, JULY 11, 1901.

Maryland's New Census.

The census just completed under State authority in Maryland fails signally to sustain the wholesale charges of partisan manipulation which have been brought for a year past in that commonwealth against the Federal enumeration of 1900. The Federal census takers, it was contended last winter by the Democratic State machine, had entered into a conspiracy to pad the population returns in known Republican counties, while denying to known Democratic counties any legitimate or natural growth. Acting on the theory that grave injustice would be done to Democratic interests by any reapportionment of representation in the House of Delegates under a fraudulent Federal census, the Democratic managers forced last winter an extra session of the legislature, at which a new enumeration was ordered, to govern the prospective reallotment of seats in the lower legislative branch. The results of the State census have now been announced, and it will be confessed by any impartial critic that in the main they only establish the integrity of the original count.

In two counties in Southern Maryland—St. Mary's and Anne Arundel—the attention of the Federal authorities had already been called to the padding of census returns, and prosecutions were begun in the Federal courts against several offending enumerators long before the results of the new State census could be known. It was to be expected that in these two counties material decrepancies between State and Federal figures would appear. In only one of them, however, does the margin of difference turn out to be really material, Anne Arundel having 5,218 more inhabitants under the first count than under the second. But as many hundreds of transient berry pickers were added to this county's population in July, 1900, who had not arrived for their brief working season in May, 1901, it may be easily taken for granted that the discrepancy now disclosed was not due wholly or mainly to partisan fraud. The population of the State as a whole is found by the second army of enumerators to be about 11,000 below the total announced last year by the Federal authorities. But as the Federal enumerators received a fixed sum for each name reported, and the State enumerators were paid by the day for their labors, it is easy to imagine, as the Baltimore Sun suggests, that the State agents, having no special inducement to collect all available names, did not return the fullest possible roll of the State's population.

Only a trifling readjustment of representation in the House of Delegates will result from the later census. By virtue of the Federal enumeration seven counties gained seats in the lower branch of the legislature. These were Anne Arundel, Charles, Kent, Montgomery, Prince George's, St. Mary's and Washington. All these but Montgomery and Kent are usually Republican. Under the State census Anne Arundel, Kent, Charles and St. Mary's fall a few hundred in population below the limit set for additional membership. Dorchester, however, gains a delegate; so that four new seats will have to be distributed. Of these one will go to a Democratic county, Montgomery; one to a debatable one, Dorchester, and two to normally Republican ones, Washington and Prince George's. Under the new census it will, therefore, be practically as difficult as ever for the Democratic machine to capture this fall that legislative majority through which it hopes to insure Mr. Gorman's return to the United States Senate.

Gorman's Boom.

The dinner given by ex-Senator Gorman at a country place, near Baltimore, is said to have been very harmonious and an almost universal sentiment was evidenced in favor of the return of Mr. Gorman to the United States Senate. A glance at the list of those present makes it remarkable there should have been even one dissenting voice. If a dinner party made up of Baughman, Vandiver, Wilkinson, Smith, Bernard, Carter, etc., would not express a desire to see A. P. Gorman again enthroned in power, his case is indeed a sad one. Gorman is reported to have said nothing about his own candidacy but merely smiled approval when the various speakers announced the fact, and doubtless those speakers when they caught sight of that smile, thought of the rich spoils and divies he would hand over to them in return for their loyalty dating from the very beginning if he succeeded in landing the prize. Mr. Gorman only deplored the fact the Democratic party was wide apart in the State of Maryland. In asserting that, he asserted a fact which is undeniable. The Democratic party is split in this State. One end of it holds all the offices, distributes all the patronage and runs all the elections. The other end is on the outside, has no voice in the deliberations or management of the party, but is made up of citizens holding to the Democratic party who are respectable, honorable, upright, intelligent and worthy. This segregation of the various elements, the office holders against the better element, has been brought about by Mr. Gorman. Now that he has been launched as a candidate for the Senatorship by his friends he admits the party is split in twain. It is, therefore hard to understand how he can expect anything else than a crushing defeat at the polls this fall. If he does not expect it, it is well for him to be arousing himself to the situation for such will be the case.

It is Well Distributed.

During his stay in Virginia, Mr. William Jennings Bryan was bold enough to say that he did not consider "present prosperity unprecedented." It is another of his dogmatic expressions, one made without the least excuse for its utterance. It was, in fact, this "unprecedented prosperity" which helped to build higher the monument of his defeat. Understanding the folly of his too sweeping statement he endeavored to qualify it a little by claiming that the prosperity is not well distributed. This last phase is even more ridiculous than the first.

Despite Mr. Bryan's words to the contrary, the facts are demonstrative of not only an unprecedented prosperity, but, also, of one that is exceptionally well distributed. Let Mr. Bryan search the conditions thoroughly and his error will be seen. In the first place, examining the country by sections, what will he find? Instead of a congested prosperity in one corner of the nation he will discover that every State of the Republic is flourishing far in excess of its best periods of the past. The East and Middle States have reaped their portion of profits, while the South and West each have a larger share to their credit than at any other time in their history. The growing independence of the banks of the West tell the story of the rapid increase out there in the volume of deposits, so that it will not be long before the surplus increment of the people of that section will make them lenders to instead of borrowers from the trade centers of the East.

Mr. Bryan need not leave his own neighborhood to perceive the improved and still improving condition of the farmers. During the past several years the general average of agricultural conditions has so wonderfully advanced that the nation at large has been astounded at the rapid liquidation of mortgages. More farmers today have balances to their credit than has been known to obtain for ten years or more.

How about labor? Let Mr. Bryan answer that. He, naturally, will declaim vehemently about the strikes. But what is the nature of the strikes? Are strikes resulting from reduced wages as they did four years ago? On the contrary, they are the consequence of mere differences of opinion as to how much wages should be increased. More laborers are enjoying constant work than ever before, and the average wage scale is substantially higher. And with labor's advanced position, manufacturing, exporting and general transportation have waxed better. Who can recall an era of prosperity in this country even half so pronounced or half so well distributed?

Social Reticence.

And now the friends of the "Man from Laurel" have come to the front with an explanation of his continued silence in regard to his position as a candidate for the United States Senatorship. It is reported that Mr. Gorman deems it the wisest policy to affect a willingness to step aside and give the others a chance. Thus it is hoped that many who would be more than lukewarm in the support of a Democratic Legislature—if Mr. Gorman were the avowed and only candidate—will be persuaded to work heartily for Democratic success.

Therefore the recent social lionizing of the "Man from Laurel" was used as a fitting occasion for the emphasizing of this principle. Every good and honest Democrat is eligible for the senatorship if he is strong enough to take it away from me. This is the position assumed by the "Martyr to Friendship," as his friends delight to style him. But who has ever doubted that the senatorship would go to any Democrat influential enough to down the Gorman interest in the Democratic machine in the State of Maryland?

But where is there a man with the slightest hope of overturning Gorman as the party is now constituted? He is the whole party, with the exception of two petty factions in Baltimore city. Ex-Governor Brown has no hope of conquering the old leaders, else he would not at present be enjoying the pleasures of the continent, but would be here attending to the fixing of political fences and sharing with the "Man from Laurel" the touching tributes of partisan after-dinner eloquence.

There is no chance on earth for any man to secure the senatorship from Maryland if a Democratic Legislature is returned to Annapolis except Arthur Pue Gorman. The mere fact that a gathering containing nearly all the members of his party that could in any wise measure up to national timber had but one man in their brains in this connection, and mentioned but one name for the nomination, is final proof that Gorman, and he alone, will receive even a complimentary vote for the office if the Democratic party is successful in the fall.

And it is important that all lovers of decent and efficient government put their cross-marks beside the names of men who are pledged not to vote for the "Man from Laurel." He and his political accomplices were turned out of power, and it is to be hoped that no negligence of the right-thinking and independent voters will permit him to regain the reins of State control. He has repented nothing; he has changed nothing. The men upon whom he depends for political success are the same, and the means are the old corruptive influences that for so long disgraced Maryland.

And in the meanwhile it is to be remarked that the reticence both political and social, of the "Man from Laurel" has deceived neither the Democrats that are opposed to his return to power nor the independent voters who have once before stamped their opinion of him and his methods upon the majority of the ballots cast at the polling booths. There exist other means of endeavor than those political; and the undeniable cleverness of the "Man from Laurel" might find less harmful employment in one of these.

How Annapolis Voted.

The municipal election held in Annapolis on Monday resulted in a very decided victory for the Republicans, who elected their candidate for Mayor and four out of six of the aldermen. This is the first time for many years that the Republicans have had such complete control of the city affairs of the State Capital, and the officers chosen should determine to make a record that will please the people and show them that their confidence has not been misplaced. The men chosen are all well-known citizens and in their administration of municipal affairs should lay aside their partianship in the interest of the public good.

The new election law was tried again in this municipal contest and while the test was not a complete one, yet the law worked in such a way as to displease both sides, and the Democrats are finding more fault with it than are the Republicans. Most of the ballots thrown out by the judges on account of bad marking showed that the men who cast them intended to vote the Democratic ticket. In the elections held at Baltimore and at Frederick the same thing proved true, and these results force the conclusion that illiterate Republicans are making greater efforts to learn how to vote than are illiterate Democrats. It was predicted that this would happen and it has happened.

This disfranchisement of Democrats does not give the Democratic makers of the law the right to plead that they acted on non-partisan principles and from disinterested motives when they placed the law on the statute books. They simply made a miscalculation, an egregious political blunder, and have only themselves to thank for their stupidity. The Republicans have no desire to gain victories by the disfranchisement of Democrats who ought to be allowed to vote. As a party the Republicans have always been defenders of the ballot, and as a party the Republicans have given to the states the best election laws that can be made. Only in states where the Republican party is the strongest do honest election laws exist. Maryland never had a decent suffrage act until the Republicans placed one on the statute books, and it took a Democratic legislature, in extra session, to undue the work and give to Maryland a law that is a disgrace to the State.

The trial of the law at Annapolis but adds to the arguments against it. The law is not an educational test, it does wrong to both parties, encourages collusion and fraud and Democrats should now unite with Republicans in a demand that the next legislature wipe out the disgraceful act and restore to the statute books the former law under which Maryland held honest and fair elections.

Probably Shaking-Up.

The reapportionment in Maryland under the new census will likely cause a political shaking up in the First and Sixth Congressional Districts. Representation of the counties in district conventions is the same as in the General Assembly, and heretofore two counties—Allegany and Frederick—have had exactly half the votes in convention, their six votes each, when combined, balancing the five of Washington, four of Montgomery and three of Garrett. Divisions in conventions of both parties have usually been on these lines, Allegany and Frederick combining against Washington, Montgomery and Garrett. This was the division the last time there was a contest of any importance in the Sixth district, when a Republican congressional convention, after fruitless balloting for three days, adjourned to meet a week later. Allegany came into the convention solid for Col. George A. Pearre. Frederick had Hon. Milton G. Urner as its candidate, but was ready to vote for Col. Pearre at the proper moment. Washington presented the name of Judge Edward Stake, but before the adjournment at Frederick changed to Hon. Ashby M. Gould, of Montgomery county, who was the real choice of the delegates of Washington county. Montgomery county was solid for Gould, and Garrett, tired of the part she had always played of helping out one or another of the stronger counties, stood firm for Dr. R. A. Ravenscroft, the county's State Senator. On this occasion the Frederick county leaders were outwitted. Before the convention met at Oakland the managers of Mr. Gould's candidacy, seeing no chance of nominating their man, decided to turn to Colonel Pearre and did so before the Frederick county delegation knew what was up.

Under the reapportionment Washington and Montgomery counties will each have one additional vote in the convention. This will give Washington, Montgomery and Garrett counties 14 out of a total of 26 votes, so that in the line-up of the old combinations Allegany and Frederick counties would be out in the cold. New combinations among the politicians of the districts are, therefore, expected.

APPEAL TO THE PUBLIC.

Opportunities to Send Out Children Sought by the Fresh Air Society.

Each year in Baltimore, the first day of July, sees a party of eager children at some railroad station waiting for the train that is to take them to the green fields and delights of the country, which some of them perhaps have never seen. To one to whom the sight of the green of the grass and the blue of the sky is a part of the day's joy, the thought that the health giving air of the country is a luxury eagerly sought for by the little children in the dusty streets and crowded rooms of the city, perhaps has never come.

To some of you who know the work of the Children's Fresh Air Society of Baltimore, the request that you share these common blessings with the children of the city comes as no new idea. To others, perhaps it will be new, because your attention has never been called to the fact that perhaps these were given you to share. To all of you whose hearts are touched quickest by the sufferings of a little child do we appeal, asking that you allow us to give you the opportunity of sharing with the children of the city the freedom of God's country—to open not only your homes, but your hearts to these little friends, giving them not only the material things for the body, but the loving care for which their hungry little hearts are aching.

To do this, we only ask that you send to us, at least a week before the date your name, the number of children you will take (we prefer, if possible, that country homes be opened to our little girls), the train you will meet, stating railroad over which child will travel.

We make this appeal for this divinely beautiful charity, because we feel that our friends in the country should have the right, during the next two months, to bring into the lives and hearts of our children higher ideals and purer thoughts than ever before their dwarfed and stunted natures have had the opportunity of knowing. We ask you, not for our sakes, though the fact that there are children waiting to be sent makes us feel our responsibility keenly; nor for the sake of yourselves, although the contact with child-life is interesting, but for the sake of the little children whom we both love.

Can we not depend on you? Write to-day to the Children's Fresh Air Society.

Don't put it off, write to-day!

TURKEY PAYS CLAIMS.

Lump Sum of $95,000 Turned Over For Distribution—Officials Gratified.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 10.—The long pending claims of the United States government against Turkey have been received by Secretary Hay.

The money was paid by the Turkish government to Mr. Leishman, our minister at Constantinople, was by him placed in the Ottoman Imperial bank and drafts remitted for the amount, which drafts have just reached Washington. The State department is now engaged in arranging for the distribution of the money among the claimants. As is always the case, the claims in the aggregate considerably exceed the amount of the indemnity actually paid, but our government has expressed itself satisfied with the payment. It assumes full responsibility for the distribution, the Turkish government paying down a lump sum of $95,000 and leaving it to the State Department to distribute this among the claimants at its discretion and after its own fashion. It is stated that as soon as the department officials can prepare their list they will communicate directly with the claimants.

Judge D. W. Sloan has improved in health very much since his arrival here. His marked improvement is a source of gratification to his many friends in and about Oakland.

On Sunday there was registered at the Oakland Hotel 180 guests. Of this number but few were transients. Col. Headley is making quite a success of the hotel.

Ex-Sheriff W. Perry Lee was successfully operated upon at the McComas sanitarium in Oakland one day last week for an ailment of some months standing which has given him considerable pain and kept him from work.

Mr. Arthur Townshend recently repainted and repaired his residence on Quality Hill. It now presents a very fine appearance and has been rented for the season to a family of summer residents. Mr. Townshend and family will reside at the Park.

Will Malette, of Pittsburg, was in town yesterday calling on our merchants. He is engaged in the above city in the manufacture of flavoring extracts, etc. He reports that things in his line are prosperous and that he is meeting with encouragement from all sides.

The press work on Mr. Morton's new book, "Winning or Losing?" which is being printed at this office, is well under way and will be completed Saturday or Monday. It will be quite a readable volume when complete, especially to those who are acquainted with the locality dealt with by the author.

Since the importation to this point of standard bred horses a noticeable improvement has been made in the farm animals as well as driving stock. It has had the effect too to induce the purchase by our town people of driving animals who enjoy these pleasant evenings in driving over the roads between this point and Mountain Lake Park and Deer Park.

Mrs. Lorenzo D. Thrasher, of Deer Park, was in Oakland on Monday in the interest of the fair to be held at that point some time next month under the auspices of the Improvement Society. Considerable interest has been manifested in the fair and it is expected that creditable exhibits will be made by the farmers and others who will contest for prizes.

The farmers are busy cutting their wheat which is a good crop this year. Grass is also better attended to. The crop this year is one of the best we have had for years. All sections of the State report fine grass crops. All the crops are doing much better than the average. Fruit is very plentiful. The apples are falling somewhat, but enough has been left on the trees to promise a full crop.

Many deaths are being reported from lightning in various sections. And the majority of victims were people who took refuge under trees from storms. That trees are dangerous shelters from lightning ought to be generally known by this time, but it isn't, and people will continue to be struck until they seek shelter in securer places, or are willing to submit to the uncomfortable but safer process of standing in the open and getting wet to the skin.

The First National Bank of Grafton had quite an experience with its time lock some days ago. In the evening the assistant cashier in closing the door neglected to move a lever that is necessary to be moved in order to make the lock work properly. The result was the next morning the door refused to open. After resorting to every device known to them the bank officials telegraphed to Cincinnati for two bank safe experts. These gentleman arrived in the evening and worked constantly for two days with diamond drills and other appliances before they got through the hardened steel with a half inch hole. If it was costly the officials congratulate themselves on having a vault that it would be impossible for burglars to get through.

Mrs. Amanda Hyde, of Brandonville, West Va., is here on a visit to her son, Mr. F. G. Hyde.

A daughter, the third, arrived at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Sincell Monday morning.

WANTED—A sexton for St. Matthew's Episcopal church. Apply to Rev. W. H. Osmond, rector.

Mrs. James J. Reynolds, of Baltimore, is here visiting the Misses Reynolds and other friends.

Mrs. George I. Uhler, who has been seriously ill for some weeks, is in an improved condition this morning.

Mr. and Mrs. Will H. Scott and little daughter, of New York, are here on a visit to the former's mother.

Mr. Frank Legge and son, of Washington, are here as guests of Mr. and Mrs. George W. Legge on Second street.

Dr. and Mrs. E. K. Goldsborough and family, of Washington, have arrived in Oakland and are occupying their residence on Oak street.

Col. John W. Averitt, State Game Warden and editor of the Cumberland Times, has been quite ill for some weeks with an attack of typhoid fever.

Mr. W. S. Dunlap, of Cumberland, who is traveling for a Baltimore grocery house, was in Oakland yesterday calling on the patrons of his firm.

The camp meeting at the Park is the leading attraction in this community at present. Great crowds go down to the park from Oakland every evening to attend the services.

An excursion from Washington to Mountain Lake Park will be run on the 19th and 20th insts. Mr. Warren Choate, proprietor of Hotel Chautauqua, interested the railroad management in the excursion. A rate of $9.60 including fare from Washington and return and boarding at the hotel three days has been agreed upon.

The Long boy, of Deer Park, who lost his leg last Wednesday by falling under the wheels of a freight train and who was operated upon at the McComas Sanitarium in Oakland the same evening has so far recovered from his injury as to be out on the piaza of the hospital.

The secretary of state of West Virginia has issued a charter to the North Glade club, of Wheeling, W. Va., for the purpose of maintaining a rod and gun club at North Glade, this county. Capital, $20,000; paid in $1,000; incorporators, Allen Brock, J. P. Maxwell, John Waterhouse, Joseph Neill, C. R. Hubbard, all of Wheeling.

Sheriff Oester advertises in this issue the sale of valuable real estate lying within the confines of Mountain Lake Park and adjacent to the Dennett hotel property. The land intended to be sold contains 17¼ acres and will be offered for sale in front of P. T. Garthright's store at Mountain Lake Park on Saturday, August 3rd, at two o'clock p. m.

The hotels and boarding houses of Oakland are enjoying a more prosperous season just at present than in a long number of years. Nearly every place in town where boarding accommodations may be secured is filled and the demand for houses either furnished or unfurnished is much greater than the supply. Some of the hotel proprietors have been compelled to place their guests in rooms of private houses.

Will Bowman, the Rowlesburg base ballist, came to town last night and was welcomed by his many warm friends. He will soon go to Parsons, W. Va., where a salaried nine will have its headquarters for the balance of the season. Oakland can hardly expect many games this season owing to the scarcity of suitable players Many of the best players have moved from Oakland and those remaining here are too busy to devote much time to practice.

Rudolph Beckman, Esq., of near Altamont, was in Oakland last Saturday and informed us that he has about closed the sale of his coal land in the county of which he is the owner of a large body. There are a number of veins of mineral underlying the land, the total of the several strata being in the neighborhood of forty feet. Should the sale be consummated at the price agreed upon, Mr. Beckman will receive a great many thousand dollars for the land which a few years ago was considered almost worthless.

The only accident which occurred in this vicinity on July 4th was the fatal injury to Mr. Andrew Kirkpatrick at 8.30 p. m. Mr. Kirkpatrick and his associates were putting off fireworks at the entrance to the Mayrland Hotel bar. He had a large "cannon" fire cracker under his left arm, when someone lighted the fuse from the rear without Kirkpatrick's knowledge. The cracker exploded, lacerating his left side, breaking two ribs and causing injuries to the heart. Medical aid was summoned and everything done to relieve the young man, but he died at one o'clock on Friday morning, at the home of his parents in Detmold, where he and his wife resided.—Lonaconing Review.

Joseph Martin and wife, of Cumberland, are here on a visit to relatives.

Mrs. Howard W. Smouse, of Fairmont, was here a day or two last week as the guest of Mr. and Mrs. M. R. Hamill.

Go to Townshend's and get 12½c. lawns and percales for 10c.; 10c. lawns for 8c.; 10c. ginghams for 8c. Clothing at almost your own price. 50c. shirt waists at 35c. to 45c. 18-4t

Mr. Henry Lauer, the baker, has purchased the Michaels property, which he is now occupying and will therefore become a permanent citizen of Oakland. The town has long felt the need of a first-class baker and in Mr. Lauer the want seems filled.

Just take a look at the most complete line of ladies' muslin underwear at Townshend & Son's. 14 4

Miss Nancy C. Hamill, of Wilson, who attended the normal school at Fairmont during the winter, arrived here on Thursday last and went over to her home Friday. Miss Hamill has been one of the public school teachers of this county for some years and is highly esteemed. She will teach at Fairmont next year.

Many thousands have been restored to health and happiness by the use of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. If afflicted with any throat or lung trouble, give it a trial for it is certain to prove beneficial. Coughs that have resisted all other treatment for years, have yielded to this remedy, and perfect health been restored. Cases that seemed hopeless, that the climate of famous health resorts failed to benefit, have been permanently cured by its use. Bear in mind that every bottle is warranted and if it does not prove beneficial the money will be refunded to you. For sale by all dealers.

Greater Security For Depositors.

A burglar proof vault and safety deposit boxes have been placed in the banking room of the Garrett County Bank in Oakland, a full description of which will appear in this paper next week. These up-to-date and necessary improvements on the part of the bank's officials render the funds and securities of the institution doubly safe from burglars.

Heartburn.

When the quantity of food taken is too large or the quality too rich, heartburn is likely to follow, and especially so if the digestion has been weakened by constipation. Eat slowly and not to freely of easily digested food. Masticate the food thoroughly. Let six hours elapse between meals and when you feel a fullness and weight in the region of the stomach after eating, indicating that you have eaten too much, take one of Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets and the heartburn may be avoided. For sale by all dealers.

Townshend & Son's line of trunks and valises is the largest and cheapest in town. 14 4

PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, at the January Session in the year nineteen hundred of the General Asembly of Maryland, bills were passed proposing amendments to the Constitution of the State:

First.—By amending section 9 of Article 5, of the Constitution of the State.

Second.—By amending section 4 of Article 3, of the Constitution of the State.

Third.—By amending section 2 of Article 3, of the Constitution of the State, which said bills and amendments are in words following, to wit:

CHAPTER 185.

AN ACT to amend section nine, of Article 5, of the Constitution of this State, and to provide for the submission of said amendment to the qualified voters of this State for adoption or rejection.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, (three-fifths of all the members elected to each of the two Houses concurring,) That the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to Article 5, of the Constitution of this State, and if adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof, herein and as by law provided, it shall supersede and stand in the place and stead of section nine of said Article.

SECTION 9. The State's Attorney shall perform such duties and receive such fees and commissions or salary not exceeding three thousand dollars, as are now or may hereafter be prescribed by law; and if any State's Attorney shall receive any other fee or reward than such as is or may be allowed by law, he shall, on conviction thereof, be removed from office; provided that the State's Attorney for Baltimore city shall receive an annual salary of forty-five hundred dollars, and shall have power to appoint one deputy, at an annual salary not exceeding three thousand dollars, and such other assistants at such annual salaries not exceeding fifteen hundred dollars each, as the Supreme Bench of Baltimore City may authorize and approve; all of said salaries to be paid out of the fees of the said State's Attorney's office, as has heretofore been practiced.

SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That the foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of this State, shall be, at the next general election for members of the General Assembly, to be held in this State, submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof for their adoption or rejection, in pursuance of the direction contained in Article 14, of the Constitution; and at said election the vote on said proposed amendment shall be by ballot, and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words "For the Constitutional Amendment" or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voter shall elect, and immediately after said election one return shall be made to the Governor of the vote on said proposed amendment, as directed by the said Fourteenth Article of the Constitution.

Approved April 5, 1900.

CHAPTER 432.

AN ACT to amend section four, of Article 3, of the Constitution of this State.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, (three-fifths of all the members of the two Houses concurring,) That the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of this State, and if adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof as herein provided, said section shall supersede and stand in the place and instead of section four of Article 3, of said Constitution.

SECTION 4. As soon as may be after the taking and publishing of the National Census of 1900, or after the enumeration of the population of this State, under the authority thereof, there shall be an apportionment of representation in the House of Delegates, to be made on the following basis, to wit: Each of the several counties of the State, having a population of eighteen thousand souls or less, shall be entitled to two delegates; and every county having a population of over eighteen thousand and less than twenty-eight thousand souls, shall be entitled to three delegates; and every county having a population of twenty-eight thousand and less than forty thousand souls, shall be entitled to four delegates; and every county having a population of forty thousand and less than fifty-five thousand souls, shall be entitled to five delegates; and every county having a population of fifty-five thousand souls and upwards, shall be entitled to six delegates and no more; and each of the four legislative districts of the City of Baltimore shall be entitled to the number of delegates to which the largest county shall or may be entitled under the aforegoing apportionment, and the General Assembly shall have the power to provide by law, from time to time, for altering and changing the boundaries of the existing legislative districts of the City of Baltimore, so as to make them as near as may be of equal population; but said district shall always consist of contiguous territory.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, shall, at the next election for members of the General Assembly of this State, to be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, nineteen hundred and one, be submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof, for their adoption or rejection, in pursuance of the directions contained in Article 14, of the Constitution of this State; and at the said election the vote on said proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be by ballot, and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words, "For the Constitutional Amendment," or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voter shall elect, and immediately after the said election due returns shall be made to the Governor of the vote for and against said proposed amendment, as directed by the said Article 14, of the Constitution.

Approved April 7, 1900.

CHAPTER 469.

AN ACT to amend section two of Article 3 of the Constitution of the State.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, (three-fifths of all the members of the two Houses concurring,) That the following section be and the same is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of this State, and if adopted by the legal and qualified voters thereof, as herein provided, said section shall supersede and stand in the place and stead of section two of Article 3 of said Constitution.

2. The City of Baltimore shall be divided into four legislative districts as near as may be of equal population and of contiguous territory, and each of said legislative districts of Baltimore City, as they may from time to time be laid out, in accordance with the provisions hereof, and each county in the State, shall be entitled to one Senator, who shall be elected by the qualified voters of the said legislative districts of Baltimore City, and of the counties of the State, respectively, and shall serve for four years from the date of his election, subject to the classification of Senators hereafter provided for.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said foregoing section hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution shall at the next election for members of the General Assembly of this State, to be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, nineteen hundred and one, be submitted to the legal and qualified voters thereof for their adoption or rejection, in pursuance of the directions contained in Article 14 of the Constitution of this State; and at the said election the vote on said proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be by ballot, and upon each ballot there shall be written or printed the words, "For the Constitutional Amendment," or "Against the Constitutional Amendment," as the voter shall elect, and immediately after said election due returns shall be made to the Governor of the vote for and against said proposed amendment, as directed by the said Fourteenth Article of the Constitution.

Approved April 7, 1900.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JOHN WALTER SMITH, Governor of the State of Maryland, in pursuance of the provisions of section one of Article fourteen of the Constitution of the State, do hereby order and direct that a copy of said bills proposing said Constitutional Amendments be published in at least two newspapers in each county where so many may be published, and where not more than one may be published, then in that newspaper, and in three newspapers in the City of Baltimore, one of which shall be in the German language, once a week for at least three months preceding the next ensuing general election (which said general election will be held on Tuesday, the 5th day of November, nineteen hundred and one,) at which the said proposed amendments shall be submitted to the qualified voters of the State for adoption or rejection, so that each amendment shall be voted on separately.

Given under my hand and the Great Seal of Maryland.

Done at the City of Annapolis on the 12th day of June, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and one.

[SEAL] JOHN WALTER SMITH,
Governor of Maryland.

By order of the Governor:
WILFRED BATEMAN,
Secretary of State.

TALE OF A STAMP.

I'm a stamp—
A postage stamp—
A two-center;
Don't want to brag,
But I was never Licked,
Except once;
By a gentleman, too;
He put me on
To a good thing;
It was an envelope—
Perfumed, pink, square;
I've been stuck on
That envelope
Ever since;
He dropped us—
The envelope and me—
Through a slot in a dark box;
But we were rescued
By a mail clerk.
More's the pity;
He hit me an awful
Smash with a hammer,
It left my face
Black and blue,
Then I went on a long Journey
Of two days;
And when we arrived—
The pink envelope and me
We were presented
To a perfect love
Of a girl,
With the stunningest pair
Of blue eyes
That ever blinked;
Say, she's a dream!
Well, she mutilated
The pink envelope
And tore one corner
Of me off
With a hairpin;
Then she read what
Was inside
The pink envelope.
I never saw a girl blush
So beautifully!
I would be stuck
On her—if I could.
Well, she placed
The writing back
In the pink envelope;
Then she kissed me.
Oh, you little godlets!
Her lips were ripe
As cherries,
And warm
As the summer sun,
We—
The pink envelope and me—
Are now
Nestling snugly
In her bosom;
We can hear
Her heart throb;
When it goes fastest
She takes us out
And kisses me.
Oh, say
This is great!
I'm glad
I'm a stamp—
A two-center.

FOR LAGNIAPPE

By Elizabeth M. Gilmer.

(Copyright, 1901, by Authors Syndicate.)

IT HAD only been three years since Beppo, with a horde of other earringed Italian emigrants, had landed in New Orleans, but already he had prospered beyond his wildest dreams of avarice. His fruit stall, built flat, cupboard fashion against the wall of a big office building, was always luscious with strange Central American fruits with queer exotic flavors, and golden with oranges and purple with grapes, and all day long he and Tessa were busy with the customers who rained a harvest of small coin into their till. Tessa herself was not the least of the attractions. She was in the first flush of her young beauty, and with her dusky hair and eyes and scarlet cheeks looked half sister to the sun-kissed nectarines in the boxes behind her.

So at least thought Arthur Gray, as he leaned against the wall, watching the quick, bird-like motions of her little head, and her deft hands, as he priced her wares with provoking slowness just for the pleasure of listening to her soft, broken English. A bad spell of pneumonia had sent him south to recuperate under sunny skies. He was very idle and a trifle bored, and—well, since he had discovered Tessa he had developed an enormous appetite for fruit, and every morning for a month the same little comedy had been enacted.

Tessa would see the tall, athletic figure coming down the street, and a moment later it would stop at the stall.

"How much?" he would ask, pricing this and that, and the girl, who was a coquette to her finger tips, would smile and ask:

"You lik'a da orang'a an' da grap'a verr'a mooch'a?"

"I like—something else very much," the man would answer, with a look that sent the quick blood flaming up into the girl's cheeks, and she would say, as she dropped a bit of extra fruit into the bag:

"For lagniappe, signor."

"For lagniappe?" he had asked, the first time, and then she had explained to him the quaint old custom handed down in New Orleans from the old Spanish days, of throwing in something for good measure with every purchase, and without which gratuity no child or servant considers a transaction complete.

With Arthur Gray his admiration for Tessa was the idlest of passing fancies, but there was one to whom the matter was serious enough. That was Giusseppe, who loved the girl with all the ardor of his passionate soul, and to whom Beppo had promised her hand in marriage just as soon as he could save up enough money to buy the horse and cart with which he peddled charcoal about the streets, and which, in his and Beppo's eyes, represented the equivalent of an ample fortune. Giusseppe had been happy enough and his strident voice calling: "Charcoal, char-c-o-o-oal," early and late, had thrilled with love and hope, as if every intonation brought him closer to Tessa and the little home for which he was working.

But since the coming of the stranger who had noticed Tessa so much everything was changed. The girl had grown cold, and the little home seemed a long way off. It takes a long time, when one must save money by the penny, and he grew discouraged. Worst of all, he had seen Tessa flush with pleasure when the American bent over her one day, and the mere remembrance set his jealous soul on fire.

The climax had come one night when, moody and sullen, he had reproached Tessa with being in love with the handsome stranger and had demanded to know where she had gotten a little trinket she wore.

The girl turned on him with sudden fury.

"Mother of God," she cried, in Italian, "but you are not my master yet."

"Bah," he retorted, "you are but a woman to be bought like all other women with gewgaws," and then he had flung himself out of the house. Giusseppe knew nothing of law, and cared less. His one thought was to find the man who had stolen his sweetheart's love and settle the affair, man to man, and, as he made his way along the street, he touched the dirk hidden in the broad belt about his waist. Tessa had said that Gray was staying at the hotel around the corner from the fruit stall and he made his way to it, hot murder in his heart.

How to find Gray he knew not, but instinctively he crouched down in the shadow of the door and waited for him. Soon or late he must pass that way. There would be a sudden spring, a thrust of a knife, a muffled cry, perhaps, and then—for awhile the angry beat of his jealous heart was like an audible voice urging him on to vengeance, and then, as the solemn night wore on, something divine that underlies all true love struggled to the surface, and the soul of Giusseppe, the charcoal peddler, humble, poor, illiterate, was transfigured by a great renunciation. He would sacrifice himself. If Tessa loved Gray, she should have him.

It was very late when Gray entered the hotel, and neither he nor the sleepy porter noticed the stealthy figure that crept in with him, and followed his every movement like a dark shadow. Gray saw him first as he turned to close the door behind him. Giusseppe entered as stealthily as a cat.

"You steal'a da love'a Tessa," he said, simply, "dassa what'a Ah come'a fo' keel'a you. Ah steek'a yo da stilletta."

Gray walked over to the mantel and rolled and lit a cigarette. His face was a trifle paler, but his hands did not tremble at their task.

"Well," he asked, "why did you not do it?"

"God'a know," replied the other. "Ah be da poor. You be da beega 'Mericana. Ah love she. Ah give'a ma life fo' she."

"You love the girl?" Gray asked, curiously, "then why don't you marry her? You know the fate of the rose that hangs too near the garden wall—" and a shrug of the shoulders completed the sentence.

Giusseppe made a hopeless gesture of assent, and then impetuously poured out the whole story—his love for Tessa, the weary wating, the little home he had hoped to make for her when he had saved up enough money to buy the horse and cart. They were to have been so happy, but now—it was all over. It was a pathetic little story of human love and longing, of faithful devotion that rose to the heights of a great sacrifice, and as Arthur Gray listened he smoked many cigarettes, and cursed his own idle folly.

"Giusseppe," he said, at last, very humbly, "if I have wronged you, it has been unintentional, and I beg your forgiveness. I admired your rose, as any man may a beautiful flower, but I have no desire to rob you of it. In my northern home there is a lily which soon, please God, I shall wear on my own breast. Go back to Tessa. Pluck your own rose, man, and tell old Beppo I shall send down the horse and cart tomorrow as a little wedding present to the bride."

The light was still burning in Tessa's room when Giusseppe made his way back to Beppo's house, and the girl, red eyed with weeping over her quarrel with her lover, sprang to the window at his first call. In a word almost he told her his glad news.

"Ah, beloved," he said, holding out his arms to the girl as she leaned above him in the window, "but the world is Heaven to-night." For answer Tessa swayed to him in the scented dark and laid her lips for the first time on his.

"For lagniappe," she said, shyly.

HE CHASED A GRIZZLY BEAR.

How a Sheep Rancher in Arizona Frightened the Animal Out of Its Wits.

Bears are not the bravest, although they are among the most dangerous of wild beasts. They are sometimes frightened by very trifling occurrences, and run with all possible speed to a place of safety.

A short time ago an Arizona sheep rancher was riding in the foothills when he saw a big, awkward silver-tip. He had a rifle, but was not certain he could kill the bear at one shot, and knew that he would get into trouble if he missed. So he gave a regular cowboy yell, and the bear started away in alarm.

The man gave chase, at the same time keeping up the piercing yell, and he soon noticed that the grizzly was getting farther away. He continued the chase for nearly two miles, until the bear disappeared in the mountains and he had not gained a foot.

In going back along the trail he noticed places where the bear had made jumps of 15 or 20 feet, and the ground had been cut up by his claws so that it looked as if a harrow had been run over it. It is evident that a man would have no show running a footrace with a grizzly.

THE EFFECT OF MUSIC.

Odd Experiments Which Have Resulted in Some Interesting Deductions.

A series of tests have been made with the ergograph, which is an instrument to be applied to the muscles of the hands and arms, to induce and measure fatigue. Until taken up by neurologists the ergograph has been used in the psychological study of school children, says the Catholic World. It consists of two clamps designed to hold the wrist and forearm firm, and a tubular contrivance to hold all but one finger straight. The free finger is then hooked into a small strap, having a weight at the other end. In the experiment the subject is instructed to crook the finger as long as he can. The vitality is shown by the length of time the subject can continue the exercise, and the capacity for being taught is supposed to be indicaetd by the pupil. And here comes in the influence of music, for it has been found by experimenting that music played during the tests had produced variations in the results which can be accounted for in no other way. For example, lively airs played on the harp seemed to invigorate the patient and enable him to keep up the exercise for a much longer time, but dreary melodies decreased the vitality and rendered the patient's arm almost powerless. The deductions reached by the physicians interested in the experiments were that musical rhythm increased the physical well-being of the patients and might be rendered a powerful means of curing them.

Marriage by Advertisement.

Marriage by advertisement seems to be much in favor in Vienna. A diligent enquirer has counted no less than 598 matrimonial advertisements in the two leading middle-class papers of that city in the course of a week. It is only the middle classes who arrange their matrimonial affairs in this way, and it is curious to notice the number of women who advertise is almost equaled by the number of men. The compiler of this list makes some sad reflections upon the levity and venality of the age. Young men and young women, he says, are no longer ashamed to regard themselves as objects of merchandise which may be put up to the highest bidder.

NEW RAYS DISCOVERED.

Reader Almost Every Transparent Substance Luminous in Darkness.

Consul General Richard Guenther, of Frankfort, transmits some interesting information concerning the latest rays. In 1895, he says, quoting from a German technical paper, a French chemist discovered rays emanating from the element uranium which possessed properties similar to the Roentgen rays. They were called Becquerel rays, after their discoverer. But while the discovery of Roentgen aroused great interest in the whole civilized world, leading to radical changes in medical diagnosis, the Becquerel rays were only employed in a very limited way in physical laboratories, and an assertion by the French scientist Demarcays that they were not emitted from uranium, but from a new element, made no impression.

Recent experiments by the Berlin high school of technology have proved this assertion—that a new element is responsible for the Becquerel rays—and the interesting fact has been observed that these rays render almost every transparent substance luminous in the darkness.

These rays make it possible to tell genuine diamonds from artificial ones in the dark. This will prove of great practical importance in testing. The experiments have also resulted in obtaining, for the first time, larger quantities of the new element, which has demonstrated that rays emanating from a larger quantity make the air such a conductor of electricity that it is hoped this property can be utilized in wireless telegraphy. Experiments for this purpose are being made in the Berlin institution, but the deepest secrecy is maintained concerning them. It is stated that the results will soon be laid before the emperor, which seems to indicate that the discovery is regarded as one of great importance.

Progress in Aerial Navigation.

The contest during the coming summer promises to be especially interesting.

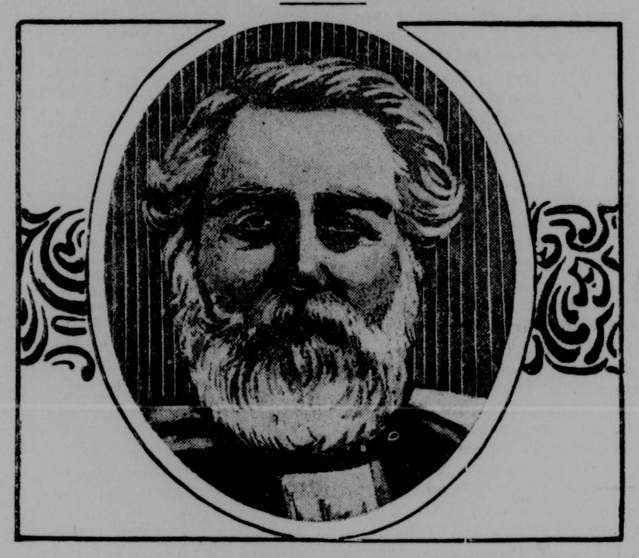
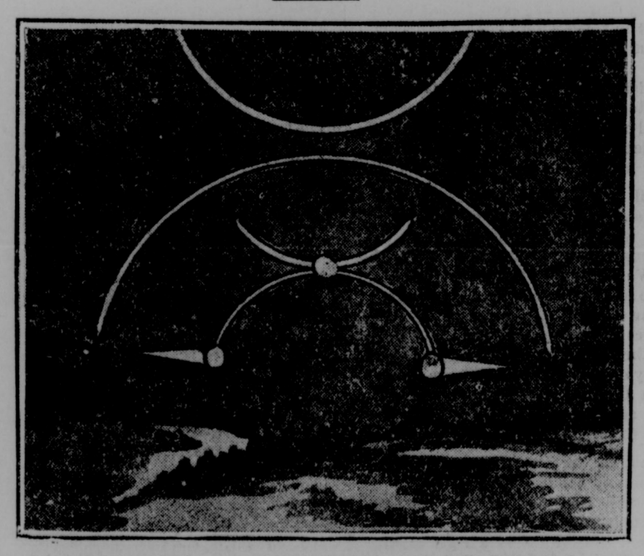
RIGHT REV. WILLIAM BENNETT BOND.



This distinguished Canadian churchman has just been elected archbishop and metropolitan of Canada by the house of bishops of the Church of England in Canada. The new metropolitan has been bishop of Montreal since 1875. He was born in Truro, England, in 1815, and emigrated to Newfoundland when he was 19. In 1840 he was ordained deacon of the Anglican church and a priest one year later. His early ministry was spent in organizing missions in the province of Quebec. He is president of the Montreal Theological seminary and one of the most scholarly divines in the Dominion.

A GROUP OF MOCK SUNS.



A curious natural phenomenon was observed at St. Gall, Switzerland, on the morning of March 17. In the veiled sky the sun shone dimly. Over it was a half halo in faint rainbow colors. To the left and to the right, and over, were seen two long streaks, cone-shaped in form, drawn upward somewhat. A short curve in rainbow colors was closed with the upper mock sun, the ends of the curve going upward. A little distance over the curve was another half halo in faint colors, and over this another curve, the most richly colored of all. The spectacle remained in sight half an hour.

SOD POULTRY HOUSE.

For Cheapness, Comfort and Convenience, Says Its Designer, It Is Without an Equal.

Every western farmer may have one of these comfortable houses with little cost and a comparatively small amount of labor. The sod may be turned at any time in the year when the ground is not frozen. A firm, well-grassed sod is best, but other will do, the only difference being in the length of time the building will last. The walls are laid up with bricks of sod about 12x12 inches and laid like bricks with the exception of the cement, nothing of that kind being used. The sod is turned down and the walls are made 24 inches thick, two layers of sod being used.

Timbers are used above openings for doors and windows; and casings are used as in a frame. The roof should slope about two feet, and should project on all sides at least two feet to protect the walls from moisture. Rafters and three-fourths-inch lumber, covered with dirt or sod, make the roof. Poles and brush may be used instead of lumber, but are not so good.

The most nearly ideal house of this kind I ever have seen is illustrated herewith. It is 14x38 feet, outside dimensions, and contains two rooms. The roosting room is 10x18 feet, inside measure, and contains two sections of swinging roosts, each 6x8 feet, leaving a passage at each end and a three-foot passage the whole length on the south, where the three windows are located. There is a stove-pipe ventilator in each room, which can be partially closed in winter. The roosts are about 2½ feet from the floor and swung on fence wire from the cross sections at the roof.

Opening from the roosting rooms is the scratching and nest room, which is 10x14 feet, inside measure. In summer it is used only for nests. These nests run the entire length of the room on the north and across the ends, except where the doors interfere. They are two feet deep—if fowls are large they could be lower—and filled up about one foot with cut straw. On the south are two full-sized windows, giving plenty of light and sunshine for winter, and easily blinded in summer, when so much light is not practicable. Floors are of dirt, covered with straw for scratching or swept clean when summer comes. Fowls will lay the whole season. They are warm in winter and cool in summer, and they seem to like the dirt walls better than any other kind I know of. For cheapness, comfort and convenience, the sod hen house has not an equal.—Mrs. L. M. Lutton, in Farm and Home.

Heat Spoils the Ducklings.

They will stand almost anything, but they cannot endure too much heat. One of the most common troubles is that the ducklings get weak-legged and almost invariably the poultry papers say that it is too rich feeding that does it. The minute you begin to overheat them the legs grow soft and large so they cannot stand up and the bill grows so soft that they cannot pick up food. It really comes from too much heat. They are particularly susceptible to the heat of the sun. It is almost invariably a fact that if you let them get thirsty and then give them water and let them go into the sun they will have convulsions and most of them will die.—G. H. Pellard, in Farm and Home.

Lettuce for the Chickens.

Lettuce is the best green food we have ever tried for chickens in confinement. They will turn from clover in any form and greedily devour lettuce in any stage of its growth if it is given to them fresh, or any time before it wilts. An ordinary sized breeding pen, say, from five to ten, will eat about eight good-sized bunches or stalks three or four times a week, and eat it clean, too. By drilling it quite thick in the rows and cutting (not pulling) it close to the ground when gathering it for fowls a little "patch" of ground may be made to yield a sufficient amount for quite a flock during an entire season. Try a patch next spring.—Interstate Poultryman.

Insects in Stored Grain.

The best way to kill these insects is to use bisulphide of carbon. This liquid quickly exhales as deadly gas, which is heavier than air and sinks down through the grain. Put the bisulphide in a deep dish at the top of the grain. Close the bin and make it as nearly airtight as possible by throwing blankets or bags over the top. The liquid will evaporate and the gas will work down through the grain. The gas is deadly and very quick to take fire. Do not breathe close to the disb, or bring any light near it.—Rural New Yorker.

Are You Going Abroad?

If you are going abroad be sure to select the Lackawanna Railroad as your route East. The terminus of that line is within two blocks of the docks of the ocean liners operated by the Cunard, Hamburg-American, White Star, North German Lloyd, Netherlands American, American, Red Star and French Lines. To the traveler, often encumbered with luggage and accompanied by his family, the advantage of landing so near his point of embarkation is at once apparent. Not only is the Lackawanna Railroad the most convenient line to the piers of the great Trans-Atlantic Steamers, but the comfort of its patrons is the special care of a Steamship Agent who will be found on the docks of all the principal lines. From Chicago three through trains are run daily in connection with the Nickel Plate offering a service unsurpassed in luxury and convenience. From St. Louis there is also a through daily service in connection with the Wabash Railroad.

BRIGHT INDIAN GIRL.

Romantic History Which Has Made Wah-ta-Waso an Accomplished Young Lady.

Wah-ta-Waso will soon enter Harvard university. She is a full-blooded daughter of the Pannawabskik Indian tribe of Maine. The early settlers found that name too difficult to pronounce and corrupted it into Penobscot. Wah-ta-Waso's Indian name means "Bright Eyes," and she is said to be pretty enough and intelligent enough to be worthy the name. Like many of her tribe, she has an English name by which she is generally known in her dealings with the whites, who find it more in keeping with their ideas to call her Lucy Nicola. She is about 20 years of age.

There is a romantic history back of the movement to send Bright Eyes to the Harvard annex. Montague Chamberlain, for many years recorder of the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard, has taken the Indian girl under his protection because one of her ancestors spared the life of one of his forefathers. Mr. Chamberlain is an ethnologist who has made a specialty of the Indian tribes of the east. He has studied their histories, their languages and their legends.

About the time of the French and Indian war some of the Pannawabskiks, who had wandered from Maine to the St. Lawrence, joined the Indians under the French and made a raid into English territory, including an attack on Ticonderaga. With the English force was a trader from Boston named Chamberlain, who got into a hand-to-hand conflict with a powerful Penobscot Indian. In the struggle they clinched, but the redskin was the better wrestler and threw the white. Chamberlain managed to regain his feet and start on a run, but the Indian overtook him, and, having picked up a club, knocked Chamberlain down before he could use his knife. The strength and courage of the white evidently won the admiration of the Indian, for as he stood over Chamberlain with club in hand the Penobscot said in English:

"I like you. Make you my son. You good fighter."

Chamberlain was accordingly treated as a prisoner and was taken to the Indian village of St. Francis, on the St. Lawrence river. While he was permitted to roam freely about the village, the Indians kept a watchful eye on him, and he knew he was a captive. He learned, however, to like the Indian life and remained three years. Then in a fit of homesickness he decided to go home, but the captor refused to let him depart. Chamberlain had won the hearts of many of the squaws by lending them a helping hand in their drudgery, and some of the maidens of the tribe aided him in escaping under cover of darkness. He afterward became a man of consequence in Boston, and the ethnologist of to-day is one of his descendants.

The Penobscot Indians in time returned to Maine and settled on the island in the Penobscot river, which is still their home. Montague Chamberlain, in the course of his investigations discovered that Wah-ta-waso was descended from the Indian who had taken his ancestor captive at Ticonderoga, and he took it upon himself to give her an opportunity to gain an excellent education. She has had the advantage of common and high schools, and is now preparing to enter the Harvard annex next summer. Mr. Chamberlain has helped a number of the Penobscots to go to Carlisle, and he has built them a library on their island.

Bright Eyes is an accomplished young woman, for she sings well and plays the piano. She is also a pet of a certain circle of New York society, and has been entertained in that city. On one occasion she made a hit by an address she made during the discussion of the problem of immigration by a woman's club. She said, in effect:

"I believe I am the only real American here, and if anyone in the company has reason to complain of the immigration of Europeans I am that one. My forefathers owned the country from the St. John's river to the Connecticut, but the immigrants from Europe, your forefathers, robbed my people of tract after tract, until now we are restricted to one small island in the Penobscot river. Even the railroads, which are largely responsible for our loss, have deprived us of the half-fare rate they used to give the Indians. Fortunately, my people are happy though poor, but it comes with poor grace that the Americans of to-day should complain of the incursions of more poor immigrants from across the sea."

Wah-ta-Waso spoke in this strain at some length, and the audience was surprised by her self-possession, her fluency and her command of English. Bright Eyes is no ordinary Indian maiden, and Mr. Chamberlain is confident she will give a good account of herself after she enters Harvard.—Chicago Times-Herald.

CHILD'S HAND ON TREE.

Strange Freak of Nature Found in an Old Virginia Graveyard and Carefully Preserved.

One of the most curious freaks of nature discovered 18 years ago in an old graveyard near Ashland, Va., is now preserved as a much-treasured relic. A man named Robertson, who was walking through the burying ground noticed that, raised in the bark of an ancient apple tree, was the exquisitely modeled hand of a child. Roberson cut the growth off the apple tree and took the bark from it. It was seen at a glance that by taking a penknife and making the ends of the fingers to indicate nails, and also by cutting little notches on the fingers at a point where the knuckles would be, the growth would be an exact reproduction of a child's hand. Mr. Robertson did this, and the little piece of wood was regarded as a curio by all who saw it. He sold it to Mr. J. P. Luck, of Ashland, who has had it in his possession ever since.

THE HAND ON THE TREE.

With the exception of the carving at the ends of the fingers and the little notches at the knuckles, the accompanying cut shows the growth exactly as it was taken from the tree. The lines in the back of the hand are all natural. The shape of the fingers is just as they were when the bark was taken from the growth; the general shape and appearance of the hand have been unchanged, and on the inside are all the lines natural to a human hand.

The little notch shown in the cut to the side of the hand was a point where the thumb extended, but in taking the bark off the growth, this was accidentally cut off. The thumb, like the fingers, was accurate in every particular.

Rumor has it that a little child was once buried here, and that not long after the interement an apple tree sprang up. This grew rapidly and near the root of it appeared the hand, which developed by degrees until it became the size of a child's hand and in its present shape.

Superstitious people think there is some connection between the growth of this hand on the apple tree and the life of the child buried alongside of it. The fingers were all shaped exactly like those of a child and have a proportionate length and size. The palm of the hand is the same and the wrist almost a reproduction in appearance of that of a child.

Effective Table Decoration.

An effective table decoration may be made in liberty muslin in a pale lemon color or white and gold. Ruck it up into a "center," and at the end opposite the carver form the initial of the host with smilax or ivy. Then take some geraniums and pick out the petals, placing them at intervals on the smilax, to mark out the initial more plainly. Put a framework of ivy leaves and geraniums around the "muslin center" and a vase of geraniums and maiden-hair at each corner. This style can be varied by making the initial of forget-me-notes with lilies of the valley lightly placed among them, and in this case a pale green muslin center, with four vases of lightly arranged forget-me-nots and lilies of the valley, should be used.

To Relieve Black Costumes.

The woman who wears a good deal of black can alter her costume considerably if she has two or three petticoats of different colorings. One should be a black and white check or spot, and with this she must have some white revers or a white collar stitched and run with black, a white feather or white wings in her millinery, or perhaps a black and silver toque, with white osprey, and, of course, white gloves.

To Clean Soiled Millinery.

Milliners clean soiled wings that accumulate in their stock by shaking them gently in a box of white cornmeal, brushing all the meal out carefully with a fine brush. White aigrettes are cleaned by washing them gently in warm soapsuds made from good soap, rinsing in cold water and shaking them dry over a fire.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Two American women in Venice spent their first evening loafing around the lagoons in a gondola—it being moonlight, of course, and all the rest of the sentimental, charming things it is always in Venice.

"Here comes a gondola," stage whispered one American to the other, "that probably contains a pair of lovers. See how absorbed those two dim figures evidently are in each other; the gondolier, other gondolas, the witchery of the moonlight and the place—to all of it they are oblivious. Oh, what a spot for sentiment; the air is full of it!"

And as the two gondolas glided past each other the Americans heard the unmistakable accents of a fellow countryman: "I'll see your three and raise you five."—Philadelphia Record.

Mr. Smithers ran over the bills which had come from the dry goods man, the milliner and the dressmaker during the month and by means of pencil and paper deducted the whole amount from his monthly salary. He was rejoiced to find a balance in his favor of $15.98. Mr. Smithers was at once bewildered by visions of a new hand-me-down suit, which was now almost within his grasp. He had seen ready-made suits advertised somewhere at 89.98½, and was hunting in the daily paper for the ad. when his wife pranced joyously into the room.

"Oh, Henry," she gurgled, "see my beautiful new spring jacket! Isn't it a perfect love? It was only $15, and I told them to send the bill to you, dear!"

Mr. Smithers weakly let the paper slide to the floor and lapsed into idiotic admiration.—Ohio State Journal.

SPRING CATARRH MAKES PEOPLE WEAK AND NERVOUS.

MISS ANNA BRYAN, OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

Miss Anna Bryan, a favorite cousin of William Jennings Bryan, is well known socially in Washington, D. C., where she has a host of friends. Miss Bryan recently studied music at Fairmount Seminary, of Washington, D. C. In a recent letter to The Peruna Medicine Co., of Columbus, Ohio, she says:

1459 Florida Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C.

The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, O.:

Gentlemen—"At the solicitation of a friend I began some weeks ago to take your Peruna and I now feel like a new person. I take pleasure in recommending it to all who want a good tonic and a permanent cure for catarrh."—Anna Bryan.

MRS. BERTHA KOCKLER, 177 Guinett street, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

"Peruna and Manalin have done me very great service, and I recommend them with pleasure to all who suffer with nervous catarrh of the stomach as I did. Should such a disease ever attack me again I shall immediately take Peruna. I now feel very well and have a good appetite all the time. I have gained in weight. I recommended Peruna to an acquaintance of ours and he is making remarkable progress. I looked so badly for a time before I began your medicine, that now when I meet some of my friends they say: 'I was very much worried about you, but now you are looking so well.' I shall always keep Peruna and Manalin in the house as family medicines."—Mrs. Bertha Kockler.

Miss Marie Coats, President of the Appleton Young Ladies' Club, writes the following concerning Peruna:

Appleton, Wis.

The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, O.:

Gentlemen—

"I find Peruna an excellent spring and summer medicine and am glad to call the attention of my friends to it. When that languid, tired feeling comes over you, and your food no longer tastes good, and small annoyances irritate you, Peruna will make you feel like another person inside of a week. I have now used it for three seasons and find it very reliable and efficacious."—Marie Coats.

Miss Marie Coats.

Mrs. Al. Wetzel, 21 South 17th street, Terre Haute, Ind., writes:

"Peruna is the greatest medicine on earth. I feel well and that tired feeling is all gone. When I began to take your medicine I could not smell nor hear a church bell ring. Now I can smell and hear. When I began your treatment my head was terrible, all sorts of buzzing, chirping and loud noises. Three months ago I dragged around like a snail; now I can walk as briskly as ever. I am going to go and see the doctor that said I was not long for this world, and tell him that Peruna cured me."—Mrs. Al. Wetzel.

If all the tired women and all the nervous women, and all the women that needed a tonic would read and heed the words of these three fair ladies who have spoken right to the point, how many invalids would be prevented and how many wretched lives be made happy.

Peruna restores health in a normal way.

Peruna puts right all the mucous membranes of the body, and in this way restores the functions of every organ.

If it is the stomach that is out of order, and the digestion impaired, Peruna quickly makes things right by restoring the mucous membrane of the stomach.

If the nerves tingle, if the brain is tired, if the strength is flagging and the circulation of blood weakened by flabby mucous membranes of the digestive organs, Peruna reaches the spot at once by giving to these membranes the vitality and activity which belongs to them.

The pelvic organs are also lined with mucous membrane which in the female sex is especially liable to derangements. Peruna is an absolute specific in these cases. The women everywhere are praising it. No other remedy has ever received such unqualified praise from such a multitude of women.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

MAM-M-MA!!
DON'T YOU HEAR BABY CRY?

Do you forget that summer's coming with all its dangers to the little ones—all troubles bred in the bowels.

The summer's heat kills babies and little children because their little insides are not in good, clean, strong condition.

Winter has filled the system with bile. Belching, vomiting up of sour food, rash, flushed skin, colic, restlessness, diarrhoea or constipation, all testify that the bowels are out of order.

If you want the little ones to face the coming dangers without anxious fear for their lives, see that the baby's bowels are gently, soothingly, but positively cleaned out in the spring time, and made strong and healthy before hot weather sets in.

The only safe laxative for children, pleasant to take (they ask for more) is CASCARETS. Nursing mothers make their milk mildly purgative for the baby by eating a CASCARET now and then. Mama eats a CASCARET, baby gets the benefit. Try it! Send for a 10c box of CASCARETS to-day and you will find that, as we guarantee, all irregularities of the little and big childrens insides are

UNAWARES.

A song welled up in the singer's heart
(Like a song in the throat of a bird),
And loud he sang, and far it rang,
For his heart was strangely stirred,
And he sang for the very joy of song,
With no thought of one who heard.

Within the listener's wayward soul
A heavenly patience grew;
He fared on his way with a benison
On the singer, who never knew
How the careless song of an idle hour
Had shaped a life anew.

—Alice Williams Brotherton in "Poets and Poetry of Indiana."

LOVE'S TRAGEDY.

How a Girl Was Won.

The girl was looking out of the window, humming softly, with a fine air of indifference. The man was leaning his back against the mantelpiece, gloomily observing the points of his boots.

They were good boots, but hardly worth the amount of serious observation he was giving them. To any person of moderate understanding the situation was obvious. To the two actors in it it was becoming embarrassing. The man moved first.

"You are sure your mind is made up, Georgie?"

The girl stopped humming abruptly and turned round.

"What is the use of beginning again?" she said, with an impatient movement. "You know one cannot serve two masters. I am going to give my life to my art."
